The most reliable figures available indicate that the number of professional nurses in the Nation today is at an all-time high. In January 1956, there were about 430,000 professional nurses employed in the United States. This figure shows a ratio of 259 nurses to every 100,000 population. In a past era when few Americans could afford hospitalization, and even fewer availed themselves of it, this might have been an adequate ratio. But today the situation is vastly different. In 1957, 13 out of every 100 Americans went to a hospital. The growth of hospital insurance, the increasing public concern with health, the growth of other demands on the nursing profession such as industrial nursing, public health nursing, school nursing, and similar nursing activities outside of the hosptials, the increase in the number of hospitals themselves, the prolonged demand for nurses by the Armed Forces—all these factors have combined to bring the supply of trained professional nurses below the demand. The need for additional nurses is well documented and undeniable. At the insistence of the profession itself, the standards for nurse training, both in and out of the colleges, have been kept at a high level. This fact, of deep comfort to members of the public, whose very lives may some day rest in the hands of a trained nurse, has kept the supply of nurses from growing as it otherwise might.

With the growing gap between the public demand for nursing services and the limited supply of professional nurses, our hospitals have had to resort to varied techniques to fulfill their mission. The priceless skills of the professional nurse have had to be rationed, as it were, and the nonprofessional aspects of what were once the duties of the nurses have had to be handed over to nurses' aides, to practical nurses, and to hospital orderlies. But even with these techniques of stretching available skills, the need for professional nurses remains unfilled.

But, as I suggested earlier, why is it necessary to demand college training when the hospital-trained nurses now comprise such a vast portion of the profession?

Let me say first that no question can be posed as to the great work being done by hospitals in training nurses, nor as to the quality of the work done by these nurses. They are not second-best, they are not in some shadowy area of competence. The professional nurse today, whether hospital trained or college trained, deserves the highest praise and the deepest admiration of her fellow citizens. They are not overpaid by any stretch of the imagination, and they are far from underworked. For most people, the constant strain of the nursing profession, the intimacy with death and disease, the responsibilities that fall upon these dedicated men and women, put nurses in the same category as the members of other professions whose choice of a lifework can only be attributed to the overriding power of conscience and the will to self-sacrifice on behalf of humanity that characterizes, for example, teacher. It is not from any dissatisfaction with the caliber of the work being done by the average nurse today that the nursing profession itself has urged the expansion of college training programs.

First, the nurse today is being called upon increasingly to perform work of a scientific and technical nature which is a far different thing from the job given to the nurse of a generation ago. Let me quote from an article appearing in the New York Times of August 25, 1957, written by Wayne Phillips, a journalist of several years' experience on hospital staffs:

> Besides the basic subjects she is expected to have studied in high school—biology, chemistry, mathematics—the professional nurse today must have a good foundation in anatomy, physiology, microbiology, and nutrition. Through training in the specific needs of different types of patients, she is introduced to the principles not only of simple medicine and surgery, but also of urology, neurology, geriatrics, pediatrics, obstetrics, orthopedics, psychiatry, sociology, gynecology, ophthalmology, and otolaryngology. And she must learn the techniques of her profession as practiced in public health and clinical and industrial nursing as well as in hospitals.

The registered nurse today must prepare medications, assist at surgery, and carry out professional duties which not very many years ago were restricted to the medical profession itself. Here is the basic reason for the demands of America's nurses that the newcomers to the profession be encouraged and enabled to pursue their education to the collegiate level.

Today's nurse is doing a magnificent job for inadequate salaries, on the basis of preparation which is not always able to keep up with the increasing complexities of the nurse's job. She is being given more and more responsibility of a supervisory and educational capacity. The demands for a broader based, more professional training program are urgent. The willingness of the persons engaged in the profession is manifest. The time for action, Mr. Speaker, is now.

Mr. Speaker, in the days since H.R. 1251 was introduced, I have received from nurses' associations and from nursing educators, considerable mail in support of this bill. I ask unanimous consent that selections from this mail be printed at this point in the RECORD.

FEBRUARY 14, 1959.

The Honorable EDITH GREEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MRS. GREEN: District 12 of the Idaho State Nurses Association wishes to inform you that we are very much in favor of bill H.R. 1251, Collegiate Nursing Education Act.

Will you please send me a copy of the bill?

MRS. BARBARA JOHANSEN, R.N.,
Legislative Committee, Route 1, Jerome, Idaho.

NEW YORK STATE NURSES ASSOCIATION,
Albany, N.Y., February 17, 1959.

Hon. EDITH S. GREEN,
Old House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MRS. GREEN: I am writing to you on behalf of the New York State Nurses Association in support of H.R. 1251, the Collegiate Nursing Education Act of 1959.

It is a well recognized fact in this State that if we are to meet the nursing shortage we must have better qualified teaching and administrative personnel as well as more students entering the nursing profession. If we can increase the number of students entering baccalaureate degree programs we will have taken a step toward remedying both the shortage in bedside nursing and teaching personnel as graduates of these programs may either remain in bedside nursing or in less time than it takes graduates of diploma school programs to prepare themselves for teaching and administrative posts.

The board of regents of the University of the State of New York being cognizant of the nursing shortage appointed a nurse resources study group for the purpose of surveying nursing personnel resources and needs and facilities in professional nursing education. These studies have now been completed, the first one published in 1956, the second only just released and now awaiting publication. Copies of both of these studies are enclosed for your information.

Acting on the recommendations of the nurse resources study group, the regents sponsored the following bills in the State legislature:

Senate Int. 1846, Brydges; Assembly Int. 2563, D. B. Lawrence: It would amend sections 601 and 611 of the education law, to establish 150 additional regents scholarships for basic professional education in nursing, to be awarded on statewide basis to pupils having highest standing on State list arranged in order of merit regardless of residence. The measure, which was referred to the senate finance and assembly ways and means committees carries an appropriation of $46,200.

Senate Int. 2429, Brydges; Assembly Int. 3091, Brady: Adds new section 626, repeals section 613, education law, to change and extend provisions relating to scholarships for advance professional educational nursing to provide for 60 regents fellowships for teachers and administrators of nursing, with awards to be based upon competitive examinations and entitle holder to $2,500 if income is $1,000 or less, and if income exceeds such amount, award shall be diminished by $1 for each $4 over $1,000, with no grant to be less than $500; provides for payments, fixes conditions of awards and appropriates $132,000. Assembly ways and means committee.

Comment: Under the present law, New York State annually grants 30 State scholarships for advanced nursing education. Each such scholarship is for $750 for 1 year of study.

While both of these measures, if passed and signed into law, would be of tremendous assistance to us in this State they would not nearly meet the real need as evidenced in the reports of the nurse resources study group, so you see that even though on a State level we are making every attempt to secure financial assistance we also need the kind of help proposed in your bill.

We are, therefore, urging you to do all in your power to secure passage of H.R. 1251 not only because it will help to prepare more nurses but because it will be reflected in the kind of care the public deserves.

May we also take this opportunity to thank you for your interest in our profession. Having had the pleasure of hearing you address our group in Washington last year we now feel more than ever indebted to you.

With all good wishes, I am,

Sincerely,

KATHERINE E. REHDER, R.N.,
Executive Director.

ALABAMA STATE NURSES' ASSOCIATION,
Montgomery, Ala., February 17, 1959.

Hon. EDITH S. GREEN,
Washington 25, D.C.

DEAR MRS. GREEN: As executive director of the Alabama State Nurses' Association, I wish to express the appreciation of Alabama nurses for your interest in nursing education and your efforts in expanding opportunities for this education in colleges and universities throughout the United States in the introduction of H.R. 1251 in the House of Representatives to authorize a 5-year program of grants and scholarships for collegiate education in the field of nursing. Members of the Alabama State Nurses' Association are cognizant of the vital need in this State for the expansion of collegiate educational facilities and for scholarship assistance.

There is a critical need in Alabama for qualified teachers, supervisors and consultants in nursing if the people of the State are to receive optimum nursing care. Because of the high cost of education and the relatively low salaries in the nursing profession few Alabama nurses can afford to leave their jobs for an extended period of time, obtaining their advanced preparation on a sporadic, piecemeal basis—night classes combined with full or part time employment. According to a recent survey 25 percent of the active nurses in Alabama have earned some credits toward a degree. Every available scholarship on the baccalaureate level is being used and requests for additional scholarship assistance are frequent.

Preparation beyond the basic level is generally considered necessary for nursing education, public health nursing, occupational health nursing, anesthesia and certain levels in institutional nursing. Alabama nurses, however, have been handicapped in securing nursing education to fit them adequately for positions in these fields as indicated by the results of a 1958 study of nursing needs in the State. In the field of nursing education 5 percent are shown to have no preparation beyond the basic level while 29 percent have some hours toward a degree. Approximately 25 percent of the public health nurses, 64 percent of the institutional nurses, 67 percent of occupational health nurses and 20 percent of the anesthetists have no additional education beyond the R.N.

There are two collegiate nursing programs in the State, one at the University of Alabama headed by Dr. Florence Hixson as dean, the other at Tuskegee Institute, where Mrs. Lillian Harvey is dean. Both of these schools have limited facilities at present, a problem, which will naturally be emphasized as the student body increases.

Alabama during the past year was unable to use several of the traineeships granted under title II of Public Law 911 as we did not have graduates holding baccalaureate degrees eligible for admission to the masters program.

Assuring you of the full cooperation of the nurses of Alabama, I am,

Sincerely,

MRS. WALTER BRAGG SMITH, R.N.

KANSAS STATE NURSES' ASSOCIATION,
Topeka, Kans., February 16, 1959.

Hon. EDITH S. GREEN,
Old House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MRS. GREEN: We are pleased to learn of the bill you are introducing in the House of Representatives which will provide grants and scholarships for collegiate education in the field of nursing. We appreciate your concern and your practical efforts to provide opportunities for programs in nursing education in colleges and universities throughout the United States.

The University of Kansas, department of nursing, is the only collegiate program for nursing education in Kansas. One of the great needs at this school is for qualified faculty to teach the students seeking entrance to the program. This year there were more applicants for this particular school of nursing than could be accepted with the limited number of faculty for the school of nursing. We believe that this bill which you are introducing will assist directly with this critical need in our State.

Sincerely yours,

HULDA O. WEGENER, R.N.,
Executive Secretary.

THE CONNECTICUT
STATE NURSES' ASSOCIATION,
Hartford Conn., February 13, 1959.

Representative EDITH S. GREEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MRS. GREEN: We are a constituent of the American Nurses' Association and speak for the graduate nurse population in Connecticut. In this State there are 15,000 active practitioners in professional nursing. Because of the demands of our numerous urban centers, nursing in Connecticut presents a complex picture.

We have just learned through the American Nurses' Association that you have introduced H.R. 1251, to authorize a 5-year program of grants and scholarships for collegiate education in the field of nursing, and for other purposes.

We should like to express sincere appreciation to you on behalf of the nurses of Connecticut for this fine evidence of your public interest. Favorable action on this bill will benefit not only nurses but through them, all citizens in the United States. To increase our schools by at least 40 percent in the next decade and to meet increased demands for nursing service, we too, concur with you that favorable consideration be given to this bill.

We in Connecticut feel very strongly as to the need for such a law. At present we have only two collegiate schools of nursing in our State, the University of Connecticut under the guidance of Dean Carolyn L. Widmer (who is also the president of the Connecticut Nurses' Association) and the University of Bridgeport under the leadership of Dean Martha P. Jayne.

Two additional collegiate schools in Connecticut have closed because of lack of funds, one connected with a liberal arts college (St. Joseph's) and the second a post-baccalaureate program at Yale. We in Connecticut have felt the loss of these schools most keenly. Although we know we need 33 percent of our people prepared on a bachelor's level in Connecticut, only 10 percent of our students are enrolled in schools with bachelor's level preparation.

Nursing studies in Connecticut have shown that present faculty members of several of our nursing schools are inadequately prepared for teaching. And not only is there a shortage of teachers, but there is a shortage of qualified supervisory personnel and of professional registered nurses in Connecticut also. The public health nurses in our State ranked 39th nationally in a 1957 survey made by the USPHS in the number of nurses in public health positions who have had at least 1 year of approved preparation in public health nursing.

We are grateful for the Federal traineeships granted in the last legislative session. These have been helpful, but they are only the beginning. Because our need is so great we in Connecticut are taking every opportunity of improving our local area—we have introduced a bill in our 1959 State legislature asking for scholarship aid to registered nurses on a baccalaureate level—but we also need Federal assistance.

We must have well-prepared faculty in order to increase our student nurse enrollment. If we can do this, we can thus offer optimum care to the increased number of patients our ever-increasing lifespan and growing population presage.

We hope sincerely that it will be possible for you to lend your support for an early hearing. We, in turn, shall be happy to submit more detail as the time for the hearing approaches.

Sincerely yours,

ELEANOR LUNDBLAD, R.N.,
Executive Secretary.

COLORADO NURSES' ASSOCIATION,
Denver, Colo., February 16, 1959.

Representative EDITH S. GREEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MRS. GREEN: The Colorado Nurses' Association is vitally interested in your bill, H.R. 1251, and is most grateful to you for your interest in the nursing profession. Nursing education is greatly in need of the help that interested and willing persons such as you can give, and we're deeply appreciative.

Since the introduction of your bill, we have discussed it with the directors of the baccalaureate programs in nursing in this State, and all have expressed the same problems.

These boil down to the extreme need for well-qualified teachers and supervisors, and for funds to obtain facilities and instructors to provide these people.

The directors in Colorado feel that persons with adequate preparation in curriculum-building, in supervision, in present-day concepts of how to teach, are sadly lacking, and that the present Federal traineeships help only the students, not the schools of nursing, since the tuition does not begin to meet the cost of obtaining such adequately prepared personnel.

Those with whom we have discussed the situation feel very strongly that there should be a pool of baccalaureate degree people, from which can be prepared in the master's program the teachers, administrators, and supervisors so badly needed. They believe that such a program might encourage a survey of the present masters degree curriculum which presently seems lacking in a number of areas, especially those of outright teaching methods and certain clinical areas, as well as administrative techniques.

We have in Colorado three schools of nursing offering baccalaureate programs. Following is a list of these schools with the names of the directors of the programs. We believe that you will hear from these people, too, about their needs.

Mrs. Henrietta Loughran, Dean, School of Nursing, University of Colorado, Boulder, Colo.; Miss Louise Golden, Director, School of Nursing, University of Denver, Denver, Colo.; Miss Margaret Metzger, Director, Division of Nursing, Loretto Heights College, Loretto, Colo.

A check with the director of public health nursing in Colorado brought to light the fact that only about 50 percent of the public health supervisors have degrees, and only about 45 percent of the staff nurses in local health units are graduates of degree programs although 80 percent of these nurses have public health preparation. The great need in Colorado is for trained public health nurses for the rural areas. About 4 percent of the Colorado population has no generalized public health nursing service whatever. We were told that about 12–20 qualified public health nurses could be used throughout the State, particularly in the rural areas.

Again, we express our very great appreciation for the work you are doing on behalf of the nursing profession, and assure you of our cooperation and help wherever possible.

Very sincerely,

MARGARET LEWIS,
Chairman, Committee on Legislation.

TENNESSEE NURSES' ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Nashville, Tenn., February 16, 1959.

Hon. EDITH S. GREEN,
Old House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MRS. GREEN: Those of us present at the ANA conference on legislation in Washington last year still recall your stimulating keynote address with enthusiasm. It is with much satisfaction that we have learned of your introduction of the Collegiate Nursing Education Act of 1959 in this session of Congress.

Since a resurvey of nursing needs and resources in this State in 1955 revealed our critical shortage of adequately prepared nursing personnel, we have been working diligently to bring about solutions to some of our problems. At the moment we have two bills in the State legislature and a third to be introduced. Because of this activity, we have certain reports containing data about nursing needs in Tennessee that will interest you. Also, this information will indicate to you that the enactment of your bill, H.R. 1251, would help to meet the health needs of this particular State.

We deeply appreciate your continued interest in nursing and your willingness to work for expanding opportunities in nursing education in colleges and universities. If we can be of any assistance to you, please let us know.

Sincerely yours,

MARY ELIZABETH DUNN,
Registered Nurse.

Columbus Day Should Be a National Holiday

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM C. CRAMER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, on February 5 I introduced a bill, H.R. 4188, to make October 12, Columbus Day, a legal holiday.

Columbus Day is already a State holiday in 39 out of our 49 States.

In fact the only States which do not pay honor to the discovery of America are Alaska, the District of Columbia, Idaho, Maine, Massachusetts, North Carolina, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia, and Wyoming.

It is not always called Columbus Day. In Alabama October 12 is designated as Fraternal Day. In Indiana, North Dakota, and Ohio it is called Discovery Day, and in Wisconsin it is known as Landing Day.

Arkansas, Iowa, and Oregon call it Memorial Day.

It seems to me that with so many of the States celebrating October 12 each year as a legal or public holiday, the time has come to make it known as a national holiday for all Americans.

Certainly there is no event deserving more of nationwide acknowledgment and celebration than the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus.

There is no person in history, to whom the American citizenry is more indebted, than Christopher Columbus; no person of greater fortitude and determination; no person who better exemplifies the American impulse to discover new horizons, to press forward, to prove for ourselves the falseness of outmoded theories; and no person has made greater self-sacrifice or taken greater risks in order to serve the future of humanity.

It is only fitting that Columbus Day be declared by Congress as a legal national holiday.

Crime Prevention Week Observed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. MINSHALL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. MINSHALL. Mr. Speaker, it is a sad fact that crime has become big business in the United States. Major crimes last year neared the 3 million mark, an appalling increase of 50 percent since 1952.

Recently, J. Edgar Hoover said:

One of the greatest obstacles which law enforcement faces today is the apathy and disinterest of a large segment of the population. Far too many of our citizens seem to look upon lawlessness as a matter of concern only to the courts, the police, and others in related professional fields.

Last week, the Exchange Club of Fairview Park, Ohio, which lies in the 23d District, took a giant step in dispelling their community's apathy and disinterest in crime prevention.

Mr. Arlin Weardahl was chairman of the Exchange Club's observance of Crime Prevention Week, February 8–14, in Fairview Park. Mr. Weardahl and his committee performed a yeoman service in rallying local churches, parent-teacher organizations, youth clubs, service groups, and law-enforcement agencies in an impressive, week-long series of crime prevention programs.

The Fairview Herald, published by Mr. Emil M. Uschelbec, gave strong support to the week's activities, featuring a four-page spread on crime prevention in its February 5 edition. Commenting in its editorial columns, the newspaper stressed:

Such a program also depends upon the interest of the average resident—your neighbor and mine—who helps the police, the schools and the churches to do the job. Crime is not absent from suburban communities such as ours—but we feel it is being effectively combated by such a program as this one.

Highlights of the week included special church services; talks by Juvenile Court Judge Albert A. Woldman, Detective Robert Lee and Patrolman Fred Standen, and Cuyahoga County Prosecutor John T. Corrigan; a special proclamation by Mayor James A. Dunson; open house at the Fairview Police Department under the charge of Chief Albert Burkhart.

Cooperating with the Exchange Club in sponsoring Crime Prevention Week in Fairview Park were the city administration, the police department, the Boosters Club, the recreation department, the amateur coaches association, the Fairview Athletic Club, and the board of education.

Mr. Weardahl's committee was composed of the Reverend Fred E. Blue, Jr., and Bill Gillam, of the Exchange Club, and Mayor Dunson, Chief Burkhart, Dr. Frank Barr, of the Fairview Park schools, and Recreation Director Nelson Russ.

President Frondizi's Visit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SEYMOUR HALPERN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed in the first month of 1959 a friendly and good will conquest of the United States by the scholar-statesman President of Argentina, Dr. Arturo Frondizi. Next month the Chief Executives of Eire and El Salvador visit Washington and other great cities of our Nation. These visits are far more important than mere junkets; they present to America the image of our allies and they present to our allies a proper image of the United States.

There were many special aspects of the visit of President Frondizi; first, he came in the wake of the publicized tour of Soviet Russia's Mikoyan, who tried to sell us on comradeship with the Communists. As the head of International Packers in Chicago, A. Thomas Taylor, said in introducing President Frondizi:

We prefer the spirit of partnership offered by Argentina to the spirit of comradeship offered by Russia.

During his 10 conference-filled days in 10 cities, President Frondizi dispelled any lingering doubts in the minds of American business and industrial interests that we have anything to fear in the partnership he offers our investors in the development of the enormous resources of his country. As DeGaulle has done in France, as Britain's belt-tightening did after the war, so has Frondizi's austerity program impressed all of us with his dedicated determination to solve the economic problems of his country with a courageous disregard for the normal political perils.

Further, a group of 25 Argentine business and industrial leaders have come here to visit their counterparts in America, and they have candidly explained that most of them were opposed to Dr. Frondizi in his elections which made him President, but his courage since inauguration has so impressed them that they now find themselves in full support of his efforts to strengthen the economy of their country. Theirs is eloquent testimony to the Frondizi leadership.

All of this is of the utmost importance to our country, because we know the many shrewd moves of Soviet Russia to infiltrate not only the culture and government of countries in the Western Hemisphere, but also their economy. For a time, following the angry outbursts against us throughout Latin America at the time of Vice President NIXON'S trip to South America, we were shocked and shamed by the obvious weaknesses in our relations with our onetime good neighbors. President Frondizi has reassured us that at least in the southernmost anchorage of the hemisphere, we have strong and good friends who are eager to be partners with us.

Certainly, in this connection, the work of the State Department's Division of Protocol, under Wiley Buchanan and his Deputy Chief, Clem Conger, is to be highly commended. And, also, in passing, I would like to note another role in this fine presentation of a clear image of Argentina to the United States. I refer to the splendid public relations in the handling of the informational task of the Frondizi trip. I understand this was handled through Tex McCrary's public relations firm. He and his associate, Jerry Finkelstein, are to be commended for performing a valuable service to this country when they make available to the U.S. press, quickly and concisely, all the necessary background information on the Government they represent.

We all know our failing as a nation to think of other nations in terms of individual images—nearly 400 million people of India are symbolized in Premier Nehru; France was almost anonymous until De Gaulle; England is the Royal Family and Sir Winston Churchill; and unfortunately, a few dictators have cast their shadows across the image of the whole of Latin America: Perón, Batista, Pérez-Jiménez, and still Trujillo. But now there is emerging a new image of Latin America: In El Salvador, José Maria Lemus; in Chile, Jorge Allessandri; in Mexico, Adolfo Lopez Mateos; in Venezuela, Romulo Betancourt.

And clearest image of all, reminiscent of our own Woodrow Wilson, is Frondizi of Argentina, who has in 10 days almost wiped out the memory of Perón. Of Dr. Frondizi it can be truly said: "He came, we saw, he conquered." This is a healthy victory for international public relations.

A Bill Which Proposes Congressional Procedures for Handling Contempt of Congress Citations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill which will amend section 194 of title II of the United States Code to provide in substance that all contempt citations which issue out of a House committee will be referred to the House Judiciary Committee for its study, recommendations and report to the House. Contempt proceedings are serious and should not be lightly entertained. If the present House procedures which treat them casually without adequate study are not changed the House will continue to find it difficult to have contempt citations enforced by the courts in judicial proceedings. The result will be that the investigating powers of the House will continue to be badly weakened. It is the basic prerogative of the Congress to investigate and legislate in legitimate areas of inquiry. This is not an unlimited right. It is subject to reasonable and necessary restraints which are contained in the same instrument which created this legislative prerogative, the Constitution. In its search for information it is necessary for the Congress to bring before its committee forums hundreds of citizens to testify and to relate their experiences pertinent to the legislative matter in question. If we in the Congress are to perform the duties prescribed for us by the Constitution, it is essential that we have the help and cooperation of all our citizens. We must have respect from the people for our congressional investigative committees for from a healthy respect comes the necessary cooperation. To gain this respect, we in the Congress must in turn respect the individual rights of all citizens who appear before our fact-finding committees to encourage the necessary rapport between the investigator and the witness. It is absolutely essential that we set up proper procedures that will strike a proper balance between committee rights and obligations arising from its legislative power and the rights and obligations of our individual citizen. The very nature of a contempt proceeding denotes disagreement between the investigator and the witness. This disagreement could be the result of one or many complex reasons. It could result from a disregard and disrespect for a duly constituted legislative investigative body. The question then arises what has occasioned this disrespect for a particular committee. When allegations are made that a committee has itself violated the individual and constitutional rights of a citizen who has appeared before its committee then a legitimate point of inquiry is raised which forms a very important part of the bundle of facts leading up to the request by the committee for a contempt citation.

Is the citing committee an appropriate judge of its alleged abuse and disregard of the rights of the individual witness? I submit that it is not. Is it consistent with our basic sense of fair play to permit the accuser to try and find guilty the accused of an act which may have been the consequence of the accuser's act? To ask the question is to answer it. What then is the solution? A possible solution lies in a fair and impartial congressional review by an appropriate House committee. I submit that the House Judiciary Committee in this instance would be an appropriate committee for review. Under present House rules it is possible for the particular committee in question to come before the House with its request for the contempt citation of an allegedly recalcitrant witness to present the matter under a rule limiting debate where only one point of view is presented and to secure House action on such a serious matter without a full inquiry into all of the facts leading up to the committee's request for such citation. The allegation has been made that a particular House committee has violated House rules of procedure and disregarded the individual rights of the particular witness. Then it is appropriate and necessary for the House of Representatives to make inquiry into these charges to determine their validity or invalidity as the case may be. The House must determine for itself whether one of its committees has exceeded the bounds when a report and resolution for a contempt citation is presented to it by one of its committees. It should consider among other things, first, what are the limits of the constitutional authorities of the Congress to investigate; second, what is the extent of the jurisdiction that the House granted to the committee involved; third, has the committee followed the rules of procedure established by the Congress in conducting the investigation and which gave rise to the alleged contempt. The failure of the House of Representatives to thoroughly consider each request for a contempt citation has resulted in the judicial reprimands contained in the Watkins decision and the Arthur Miller case and others. The review of each request for a contempt citation by an impartial third party will make each of us more aware of the constitutional rights of our citizens who appear before our committees and the duties which they demand for their protection and preservation. It will then be self-discipline that will thwart possible congressional committee abuses rather than attempt by the judiciary to discipline the Congress. If this is done the constitutional rights of our citizens will be preserved and the dignity and integrity and powers of the Congress will be maintained. I earnestly suggest, Mr. Speaker, that my proposed bill will fill the obvious needs as above outlined. I am hopeful that the Congress will act upon this bill this year.

Who's Who and What Is Going on in Space—A Space Lesson

OF
HON. JAMES G. FULTON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, Abe Silverstein is Director of Space Flight Development at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration headquarters in Washington, D.C. Before the NASA was established, on October 1, 1958, he was associate director of the Lewis Flight Propulsion Laboratory, Cleveland, Ohio, a research center of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, which formed the nucleus of the NASA.

Silverstein directs those NASA programs aimed at the development of space flight. Development programs under his direction include space probes and manned and unmanned satellite systems. He is also responsible for the development of propulsion systems capable of powering these space vehicles.

Silverstein is a native of Terre Haute, Ind., where he attended local grammar and high schools. He earned a bachelor of science in mechanical engineering degree in 1929, and a mechanical engineering degree in 1929, and a mechanical engineer professional degree in 1934, from Rose Polytechnic Institute. He was awarded an honorary Ph. D. degree by Case Institute of Technology in 1958.

Silverstein joined the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics in 1929 and soon after helped design the full-scale wind tunnel at the Langley Aeronautical Laboratory. He later was placed in charge of this facility and directed research which increased the high-speed performance of most of the combat aircraft of World War II. This work was recognized as a major factor in gaining U.S. air superiority during the war.

In 1943 he was transferred to the Lewis Laboratory at Cleveland to select and train a staff which he directed in research at the altitude wind tunnel. These investigations led to significant improvements in both reciprocating and early turbojet aircraft engines. He also pioneered with large-scale ramjet engines, now used on certain missiles.

At the end of World War II, Silverstein was directing the work at several major research facilities at Lewis. He directed the erection of the $9 million NACA 8- by 6-foot supersonic wind tunnel, first operated in 1949, and the $33 million NACA 10- by 10-foot supersonic wind tunnel, completed in 1956. These facilities, the largest wind tunnels of their kind in the world, have greatly accelerated the development of supersonic aircraft. In 1952 he was appointed associate director of the Lewis Laboratory, a post he held until he was named to the headquarters staff of the NASA.

Silverstein was a member of several NACA committees and subcommittees, including: Committee on Aerodynamics, 1946 to 1947; Subcommittee on Self-Propelled Guided Missiles, 1945 to 1947; Subcommittee on Internal Flow, 1947; Subcommittee on High-Speed Aerodynamics, 1945 to 1957; Committee on Powerplants for Aircraft, 1951 to 1957; and the Special Committee on Space Technology, 1958.

He served as chairman of the Cleveland section of the Institute of Aeronautical Sciences, 1946 to 1947. He was a member of the committee on arrangements for the joint meeting of the Institute of the Aeronautical Sciences and the Royal Aeronautical Society, held in New York City, in 1949. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Development appointed him a member of the Technical Advisory Panel on Aeronautics for the year 1955, and as chairman of the ad hoc working group on rockets for 1956. He was a member of the scientific advisory board of the Chief of Staff, U.S. Air Force, for 1956 and 1957, and chairman of the OASD technical advisory panel on aeronautics, ad hoc group on propulsion for aircraft and missiles. He was a member of the Assistant Secretary of Defense's steering group of the Advisory Panel on Aeronautics for 1958.

Silverstein was American representative to the joint meeting of the Institute of the Aeronautical Sciences and the Royal Aeronautical Society, in London, in 1947. He delivered the annual Wright Brothers Lecture before the IAS in 1949.

He is a member of Tau Beta Pi, and a fellow of the Institute of the Aeronautical Sciences.

Silverstein, his wife Marion, and their three children, Joseph, Judith, and David, live at 7205 Rollingwood Drive, Chevy Chase, Md.

George Washington and Brooklyn

OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, we in Brooklyn are not only celebrating the 227th anniversary of the birth of the Father of our Country, but also the 335th anniversary of the formal settlement of Brooklyn.

The first actual purchase of land on the present site of Brooklyn was made in 1636 at about what is now Gowanus Bay. Between the following year and 1654 a colony of Walloons built their dwellings on Waal-boght, which we now know as Wallabout Bay.

As early as 1642—only 6 years after the first land purchase—a ferry had been established by one Cornelis Dircksen, operating from Peck Slip, over in Manhattan, to what is now Fulton Street.

Nearby, at the intersection of Fulton and South Streets, the settlement of Breukelen—Broken Land—was established. It was named for a village in Old Holland.

In 1643 Lady Deborah Moody, having been excommunicated by the Puritan Church in Massachusetts because of her disbelief in infant baptism, settled with some English followers at Gravesend.

By 1660—the year of the Restoration in England—New Utrecht, Midwout—Midwood—and Bushwick had been established.

These Dutch-Walloon settlers brought to Manhattan and Long Island a type of culture and community life entirely their own, of which the Dutch Reformed Church was the focal point. Around it all else revolved. Even after the American Revolution, the pattern was still strong enough to impress itself upon the village and, later, the city. That pattern was, as one writer has described it, one of "order, sobriety, piety."

Oddly enough, the Dutch and Walloons cared nothing, in these early days, for waterfront rights: they were interested in farming the hinterland; it was the enterprising Yankee across the river who established warehouses, slaughterhouses, and tanneries to which the Long Island burghers brought their cattle bred on the salt meadows sloping down to Wallabout and Gowanus.

With the coming of American Independence and the consolidation into a closely knit union, Brooklyn, like her neighbor on Manhattan, thrived and prospered. When it was proposed in 1883, that the Long Island town be incorporated into the city of New York as a sensible and practical step, mutually advantageous to both communities, a roar of protest went up from the old-timers. Stout old Gen. Jeremiah Johnson, of Wallabout, speaking for the majority, roundly declared:

> Between New York and Brooklyn there is nothing in common, either in object, interest, or feeling—nothing that even apparently tends to their connection, unless it be the waters that flow between them. And even those waters, instead of, in fact, uniting them, form a barrier between them which, however frequently passed, still form and must forever continue to form an unsurmountable obstacle to their union.

The forerunner of the argument that Hawaii is too far from the mainland to be a State.

The following year the intrepid general and his triumphant followers secured from the legislature a city charter for the village. But, as one historian observes:

> The general's defiance was fateful. Geographically and hence commercially, Brooklyn was bound to the island of Manhattan; yet it became a city and remained one for 64 years. When incorporation finally took place, in 1898, the insurmountable obstacle to the union had already been spanned by the mighty Brooklyn Bridge. The Williamsburg and the Manhattan bridges followed and the high-sounding words of General Johnson have long since been lost in the roar of three subways under the river.

By daybreak of August 27, 1776, the powerful British Army, landing under the guns of the fleet, threatened the encirclement and complete annihilation of the scanty and divided American forces. Perceiving the peril of the situation—the fate of the American cause hung indeed in the balance during these 2 days—Washington, in a masterly decision, evacuated his entire army from Brooklyn Heights during the night of the 29th in a counterstroke, unsurpassed for swiftness and efficiency in military annals. What is more, he had managed to bring back intact all the cannons, small arms, ammunition, tools, horns, and foodstuffs, so that when the bewildered British, puzzled by the strange silence, finally climbed into the empty works, they found, in the words of a contemporary historian, not "so much as a biscuit or a glass of rum wherewith to console themselves." Though men did not then perceive it, the independence of America was secured.

It is well that we inhabitants of old Breukelen think of those great days as we celebrate the birthday of the Father of our Country and our own civic anniversary.

Textile Industry Is Alarmed Over Imports From Tokyo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. J. BRYAN DORN
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the great American textile industry is alarmed over imports from Tokyo. The textile industry was hoping that Assistant Secretary Henry Kearns on his present trip to Tokyo would stand up for the American industry and its employees. I was shocked a moment ago to receive the following telegram from Mr. Leon Lowenstein of New York. Mr. Lowenstein is a patriotic American who is desperately trying to furnish employment for Americans. Mr. Lowenstein is working night and day to keep his industry going:

Hon. WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN DORN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.:

Today's news record reports U.S. Assistant Secretary of Commerce Henry Kearns as saying in Tokyo, "U.S. Government is interested in helping to expand the market for Japanese textile industry and is interested in seeing the Japanese textile market expand in the United States as much as the Japanese are interested." If such quotation is correct I wonder whether Mr. Kearns reflects official U.S. policy. By virtue of what authority does any department of our Government seek to expand markets for Japanese industry in the United States?

LEON LOWENSTEIN.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in response to Mr. Lowenstein's telegram, I am sending the following wire to the Honorable Lewis L. Strauss, Acting Secretary of Commerce:

Hon. LEWIS L. STRAUSS,
Acting Secretary of Commerce,
Washington, D.C.:

Fairchild News Service, under date of February 18 from Tokyo, Japan, reported Assistant Secretary Kearns as having said, "the U.S. Government is interested in helping to expand the market for the Japanese textile industry and is interested in seeing the Japanese textile market expand in the United States as much as the Japanese are interested."

I would be interested in knowing the source of the policy on which the Kearns statement is based. The American industry is presently sharing its textile markets with the Japanese to such an extent that it is injurious to our industry and its employees. Please advise why, in view of the present ease of access to our markets, the Assistant Secretary deems it a matter of policy to encourage the Japanese to seek an even larger share. The U.S. economy cannot be expected to absorb the Japanese industrial capacity which has been largely rebuilt with American tax dollars.

WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN,
Member of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time for this Congress to know whether or not the State Department and the Department of Commerce are really interested in helping the industry and labor of America or whether or not their first allegiance is to industry and labor in foreign lands.

This Congress has a continuing responsibility to see that our trade laws and agreements are properly administered by executive agencies.

Importance of the Boy Scout Movement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, on February 13 last, it was my privilege to address a meeting of Scouters and their parents at the Windermere M.E. Church in East Cleveland on the "Importance of the Scout Movement." It was particularly significant that Boy Scout Week was being celebrated all over the Nation at the same time that Americans everywhere were commemorating the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln.

Under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include the text of my speech herewith:

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON, WESTERN RESERVE DISTRICT, BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA, WINDERMERE METHODIST CHURCH, CLEVELAND, OHIO, FEBRUARY 13, 1959

Members of the board of the Western Reserve District (District No. 7) of the Greater Cleveland Council (No. 440) of the Boy Scouts of America, Den Mothers, Cubmasters, Scoutmasters, Explorer advisers, Scouters of every sort and kind, executive staffs and such Scouts as may be here, as well as your many guests: I greet you with a deep sense of the privilege it is to be amongst you here in this great Windermere Methodist Church on this fellowship night.

Yesterday in Washington a joint session of the Congress gathered to do honor to the humble, modest, magnificent Abraham Lincoln, of whom it was said that when he went to a town, a village, or just a gathering, "he brought light with him."

Gathered in the House Chamber at 11 a.m. on Thursday, February 12, were Members of the Senate and House, the Supreme Court, the Cabinet, and a very large representation of the diplomatic corps. The Army orchestra play in the Speaker's Lobby, the choir of the Coast Guard Academy sang in the Chamber, Frederick March recited the Gettysburg Address and Carl Sandburg, who of all others has studied every word Lincoln spoke and wrote, gave an address none present will forget. It was a deeply moving hour, I can assure you.

It seems to me peculiarly fitting that the week set aside as "Boy Scout Week" should contain the date of Lincoln's birth. And this year we celebrate the 150th anniversary. Could one find anywhere a more inspiring example for Scouts and Scout leaders than this great man?

Indeed, I would like to suggest that wherever and whenever Scouts from Cubs on up meet, they would ask that their hours of togetherness might be infiltrated by his simple ways, his deep understanding, and the challenge of his courage and his faith. I am very certain that his spirit rejoices that there are nearly 5 million Scouts and leaders currently in America; 26 million persons who have felt the impact of the Scout oath and are infinitely better for it.

Let us turn now to Scouting.

This is a wonderful organization to whom Congress granted a Federal charter on February 8, 1910. On this last evening of Boy Scout Week in the year of Our Lord 1959, let us glance over the long list of achievements, remembering that more than 4,780,000 active Cub Scouts, Boy Scouts, Explorers and their leaders have been meeting together in happy, earnest observance.

Since 1911, 331,719 Americans have qualified for Eagle Scout rank; 199 awards for heroism or meritorious service were made in 1957 by the Boy Scouts' National Court of Honor. The Safety merit badge has been earned by 869,756 Boy Scouts and Explorers. This is only part of a wonderful record. And let us rejoice that there are 7,589,183 Boy Scouts and leaders in 67 nations around the world.

A year or more ago I foregathered with many of you in a tent on the Chagrin Reservation. It had been raining heavily and the ground was soggy, the air water-charged. But there were no empty chairs and no one grumbled. It was my first direct contact with Scout leaders and it was a thrilling experience.

And here we are tonight under the delightfully friendly hospitable roof of this Windermere Methodist Church which gives such wonderful service to this community.

What a miraculous thing it is, this togetherness. Never in our history have we so needed strength of body, mind and soul, individually and collectively, as we do at this moment. We are pitted against an adversary who, in denying the very existence of God, signed his own ultimate death warrant, but who is terrible indeed in his present strength. We have found him to be ingenious, in some things brilliant, in others not. We know him to be cruel, ruthless, deceiving and deceitful. We have found him to be without morals and without honor. And we must have realized by now that we are in a long, dark, treacherous battle for the survival not only of the nation that Mr. Lincoln hoped would go "onward and upward," that "will not pass away," but of free men across the world.

And then it is as if someone lighted a little candle and set it upon a rock and darkness gathered her cloak about her and oh, so reluctantly, turned from us and began her long way through the gloom of hatred toward the pity and forgiveness of Him whom she had tried to destroy.

"On my honor I will do my best to do my duty to God and my country, and to obey the Scout law; to help other people at all times; to keep myself physically strong, mentally awake, and morally straight."

These lads and those who volunteer as leaders believe that "because God is, I am," their strength can be the support of free men and women everywhere. Their faith can uphold the weakest among us, and even as it was with Lincoln they can bring light with them.

An organization such as the Boy Scouts of America does not come forth suddenly from the heart and mind of one man. No, a dream precedes it, a vision brings into being a tiny infant, lusty, perhaps, but not full-grown or fully panoplied as Minerva when she sprang from the head of Zeus. Yet, from the moment of birth this infant has drawn to itself the ever-increasing many whose dreams have been but fleeting, whose vision takes time to clear—the infant has become a powerful force in the Nation, praise Heaven, and makes itself felt across the world.

So has it been with this great Nation of ours which was indeed conceived in a dream and born because a few men with vision joined together to build a nation under God. But a nation is not built of bricks and mortar to fall in the first storm, but rather is it built and held together by the hopes and fears, the love and the labor of millions of men and women seeking a way to the infinite. So it is with Scouting. It rests upon the patient collaboration of literally millions of men and women determined that American boys no matter where they live shall have the opportunities that spell faith, hope and love, the greatest of the three.

I have said that the United States came into being because a few great souls saw a vision and determined that a nation dedicated to freedom, to the dignity of the individual and to the Eternal God should be born. It is not yet 200 years that we have lived—nor have we been too successful in giving true freedom of the spirit as well as freedom under law to every American. There is yet so much, so very much to do. And why not—for is not this great adventure we call living, as we come out of unconscious perfection and go toward perfected consciousness, given us that we may strive constantly to strengthen ourselves and those around us to the end that man everywhere may indeed be free?

What group is there better equipped than you of the Scouting world? What does Scouting stand for? Is it not training and discipline each of himself, each helping those with whom he comes in contact? Is it not very basic, very fundamental, not just for the Cub, the Scout, etc., but for the leaders as well, indeed, first of all? When you sit down with yourselves—alone—at the end of a Scout year and take stock, do you not find that you, as an individual, have grown in many directions? Do you not realize more and more each year the truth you came across long since and only half believed, that you cannot teach another (least of all an intuitive youngster) anything very vital about a character quality which you do not possess? Do you not find increasingly that as Walt Whitman so well said, "The gift is to the giver and comes back most to him"?

We need more Scouts, so we must have more trained and dedicated leaders. I have seen your plans toward this end and am glad indeed to add my earnest hope that the very fire of the need for men who will stand up individually and together to strengthen the great army of righteousness, will be a light which will inspire hundreds and thousands and millions to take up their part of the load.

Little by little in these years since Scouting was brought to these shores people are realizing that as President Coolidge said in 1926, Scouting is a movement that has a "unique power for fusing together in a common citizenhood in one generation, the different elements that make up the United States, which would otherwise take two or three generations of schooling and legislation."

Scouting makes visible the elements that have made us a Nation of free men, united in the certainty that in a land such as ours, "one Nation under God" there can be "liberty and justice for all."

Out of this community there can and must come a great tide of desire in the hearts of many to play a simple, quiet but very effective role in giving youngsters a clearer picture of what freedom means—of showing them that character is what makes a man and builds a nation—that honor and loyalty and courage and faith bound together intelligently with understanding will inevitably become a cleansing force not only here in these United States, but also throughout the world.

What must a boy do when he joins up? He must take the Scout oath solemnly, and as we say on Capitol Hill—"without reservavations." Listen all over again as I read it to you:

"On my honor I will do my best to do my duty to God and my country, and to obey the Scout law; to help other people at all times; to keep myself physically strong, mentally awake, and morally straight."

Strong meat, friends, but potent, for the young respond to these things with every fiber of their threefold being. How much there is in those 40 words, friends. There is a promise in them so rich in possibility that one could sing for joy.

"To keep myself"—not anyone else for him—"physically strong." I watch the many Scout troops that flow in and out of Washington when winter is done with a real thrill. Oh, they often are hot and tired and their uniforms are mussed and tell the story of hikes in dust and rain. But Scouts do not slouch and shuffle along, as all too many school groups do, even at the end of a long, hard, and exciting day. Praise Allah, we have 4¾ million youngsters who can walk.

"To keep myself mentally awake." Just sit down with a group of them—they are like hungry vultures tearing at your brains.

Just the acknowledgment of their recognition of moral values puts the whole country outside the Iron Curtain and all it has grown to mean of atheistic materialism.

So it is not casually said that a Scout is trustworthy for when a Scout repeats the oath—the Scout law—he is really saying that he will be trustworthy, loyal, helpful, friendly, courteous, kind, obedient, cheerful, thrifty, brave, clean, and reverent. Rather wonderful, that—especially when one realizes that just the words have little value to the Scout unless they are backed by dedicated, constructive action.

Surely there are—just around the corner at least—the 600 who are needed right away, men and women like yourselves who have dreamed dreams of a strong, healthy, God-fearing land, and who will find such volunteer service more enriching than they would now believe.

I agree wholeheartedly with a statement contained in a recent Boy Scout annual report, which says:

"The development of our youth to be physically strong, mentally awake, and morally straight, to be citizens of character, with high spiritual ideals and motives, is not just a desirable thing, but it is essential if America is to fulfill its mission as the leader of the free world."

Let us remember that: "Scouting is a way of living. It values deeds above words. It builds character through habit and citizenship through service. It develops cooperation through cooperating. It learns through doing. Its outdoor craft enhealthens, deepens, and enriches boy life. Scouting is a process of making real men out of real boys, by a real program—an interest-gripping, growth-producing, character-building program of activities. Scout activities are of great worth in themselves as well as in their byproducts of habits and attitudes."

Again my deep appreciation for this privilege of sharing this fellowship night with you. And may the Infinite bless this work, strengthen and keep you, and may His light shine before you on whatever road you travel.

National Historic Shrine Assured Near Astoria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an excellent article by Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, of Oregon, regarding the Fort Clatsop National Memorial:

NATIONAL HISTORIC SHRINE ASSURED NEAR ASTORIA

(By RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, U.S. Senator for Oregon)

As Oregon commemorates 100 years of eventful history as a State, talented men and women of the U.S. National Park Service are bending over drawing boards at their regional offices in San Francisco, designing the visitors' center and museum building for the first national historical shrine ever to be located in Oregon.

This is the Fort Clatsop National Memorial, which Congress and the President have recently authorized for construction at a cost of approximately $350,000 near Astoria.

Fort Clatsop National Memorial will herald an epochal event which occurred more than half a century before statehood—the original crossing of the continent by Americans, when Meriwether Lewis and William Clark ended their overland pilgrimage at the mouth of the Columbia River. They spent the winter of 1804–05 in a primitive stockade of logs which they named "Fort Clatsop." It was the first such habitation by citizens of the United States along the Pacific seaboard.

The site of this occupancy, some 125 acres in expanded dimensions, will be the Fort Clatsop National Memorial.

In November I conferred at San Francisco with the National Park Service officials in charge of preparing plans for the great undertaking. They share my view that the buildings of the memorial should be in keeping with their Pacific Northwest locale, and that perhaps such native materials as field stone and Douglas-fir siding should characterize the edifices. These officials assured me of their enthusiasm for the project, because they believe our system of national historical shrines has too long neglected the Lewis and Clark expedition.

Representative WALTER NORBLAD of the First Oregon District and I jointly sponsored the legislation authorizing Fort Clatsop National Memorial, which passed both Chambers of Congress unanimously and was signed by President Eisenhower. Several months ago I presented to the Clatsop County Historical Society the pen which the President used for this purpose.

Both Representative NORBLAD and I consider it particularly appropriate that the first national historical shrine ever to be built in Oregon should be under way just as Oregon marks its first century of statehood.

In view of the existence of McLoughlin House at Oregon City, even many Oregon historians are perplexed by the claim that Fort Clatsop National Memorial will be our State's first historical shrine of national proportions.

McLoughlin House, which pays tribute to the career of the illustrious Dr. John McLoughlin of the Hudson's Bay Co., is a national historical site, but it is under non-Federal ownership. It is privately owned and privately administered. Federal funds do not contribute to its operation or maintenance.

Fort Clatsop National Memorial, by contrast, will be developed and administered entirely by the U.S. Government. Title to the land will be vested in the Federal Government. Federal funds and personnel will be used in its administration—and, incidentally, the budget for operation will be about $22,000 annually.

Other similar national memorials of great fame are the Lincoln and Jefferson Memorials in Washington, D.C., and the De Soto National Memorial of Florida. There also is the Wright Brothers National Memorial of Kitty Hawk, N.C., where two brothers named Orville and Wilbur Wright flew their handmade flying machine in 1903.

The Fort Clatsop National Memorial, which will be along U.S. 101, represents a longtime goal of the Oregon Historical Society. Through the years the society carefully marked the site of original Fort Clatsop, as the logs crumbled back into the earth from whence they had come. Without this diligence on the part of the historical society, there might have been so much doubt about the location of the winter headquarters of Lewis and Clark that the memorial never could have been authorized.

The Clatsop County Historical Society also has played a key role in the plans for Fort Clatsop. Two of its leaders, Otto Owen and Burnby M. Bell, have been particularly assiduous in marking out the location of the historic winter encampment of the Lewis and Clark party. These local people in Astoria will see the memorial actually under construction during the fiscal year which commences July 1, 1959, because the administration budget includes $157,250 for the start of work on the undertaking.

Such a sum will be sufficient to finance building of the houses to be occupied by the personnel of the memorial shrine. It also will provide for installation of sewage facilities, parking lots, access roads, wells for a domestic water supply and for rehabilitation and protection of the recreated log fort.

It is highly likely that Congress will go along with the administration's budget recommendations in this field, because the project is not controversial. Our Fort Clatsop legislation passed both the Senate and House unanimously.

The memorial will include the rebuilt log Fort Clatsop, which was a joint project of the Astoria Junior Chamber of Commerce and the Crown-Zellerbach Timber Co. at the time of the Lewis and Clark sesquicentennial in 1955. Buildings added by the National Park Service will be featured by the museum and visitors' center, and also by two staff residences for the superintendent and the historian of the project. Roads, trails and parking areas will complete the undertaking.

Lectures on the dramatic Lewis and Clark trek will take place daily at Fort Clatsop National Memorial for schoolchildren and other visitors. A booklet distributed by the Government will explain the historical significance of the site. Such men as Herbert E. Kahler, chief historian of the National Park Service, tell me that they expect Fort Clatsop National Memorial to become a mecca on the Pacific coast for families interested in American history.

I believe the entire project should be constructed and ready for formal dedication some time late in 1960 or early in 1961. It is hoped that the dedicatory address will be given by the President of the United States, whoever he may be, at that time. After all, Lewis and Clark, whom the memorial honors, were sent westward on their journey of high destiny by our country's eminent third President, Thomas Jefferson.

(Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER was the first Member of Congress to propose Fort Clatsop National Memorial. He and Representative WALTER NORBLAD were the successful sponsors of the legislation which President Eisenhower signed late last summer creating the historical shrine near Astoria.)

Speech by Hon. Barry Goldwater, of Arizona, at the Annual Saginaw County Lincoln Day Dinner

OF
HON. ALVIN M. BENTLEY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 19, 1959

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would like to submit the speech given in Saginaw, Mich., at the annual Saginaw County Lincoln Day Dinner by Hon. BARRY GOLDWATER, of Arizona. Senator GOLDWATER presented the citizens of Saginaw with a powerful explanation of the damage done to our State by a labor dominated and controlled State government. The results of Mr. Reuther's handiwork has been the destruction of the very thing on which his strength is based, the industrial job opportunities available in our State.

The speech follows:

SAGINAW LINCOLN DAY SPEECH BY SENATOR BARRY GOLDWATER, REPUBLICAN, OF ARIZONA, FEBRUARY 9, 1959

It is a real pleasure to be back in Michigan.

This is a State of great beginnings—of great achievements.

As a youngster in Arizona I remember reading about the energy and initiative, the inventiveness of Michigan.

For years I have been driving your great automobiles across rough desert trails. I have been giving them mountain road tests that would make your proving-ground courses seem like Sunday afternoon drives.

And they stand up to it.

Yes. it's a wonderful State.

As I flew in it seemed there must be thousands of lakes here.

Water everywhere.

When I think of what we could do in Arizona with some of this water.

Solidarity House and its landlord you can keep. Just let us have some of the water.

In this month, when we are thinking especially of the name of Lincoln, we Republicans look back to the origins of the Republican Party here in your State. You are citizens of Michigan; I know you love this State. But perhaps you will allow us Republicans from other parts of the country to look with some affection and pride toward the State where began the party of Lincoln—this party of ours which has stood from the beginning for liberty, for the concept of the individual as sacred, this party of ours which has always believed in the full exercise of citizenship rights, without obstruction, without surrender of any part of these rights to any person, or to any group.

I am proud especially to be talking to Saginaw Republicans.

As chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee, I watch political trends down into the counties and into the townships. In the recent November election, you Saginaw Republicans showed vitality and a comeback power that made us proud of you.

In most areas of the Middle West, the Republican Party did not sell itself to the voters. Here in the Saginaw area, you did, and you did it very well. In Michigan, generally, the Republican Party was much better than nearby States where, in some cases, the party lost a Senator, a Governor, and control of both houses in the State capitol.

Your candidate for governor, Paul Bagwell, fought a great battle to turn back a trend. He was backed by a party finance organization which did a great job in the face of adverse economic conditions, and by very effective staff assistance.

Above all, Paul Bagwell struck at a very real issue—the destruction of jobs in Michigan—a loss of jobs which has resulted from the flight of industry to other States. Gradually the realization has spread in this State that industry is fleeing from a hostile business climate created by a Democrat Governor's alliance with a powerful and ruthless union politician.

Was the issue effective? Well, Paul did not overcome this 10-year cumulative trend at a single blow, but he took on a Governor who ordinarily runs ahead of his ticket by a quarter of a million votes, and when Paul was through with him, he stood a poor fifth on the ticket.

Political observers were watching the Governor's race in Michigan with special interest. It was thought that the Governor, whose eagerness to be President is well known, would have to run a very strong race if he were to be considered a serious contender for the Democrat nomination in 1960.

Political observers were looking at this race as a sort of popularity index.

When the election was over, political reporters across the country looked at the Governor's poor result and then marked him off the list of Presidential contenders.

Just a week ago, in Washington, their judgment has again been confirmed. A nonpartisan research agency took a poll of all the Democrats elected to Congress to find what man these leading Democrats would like to see as Democrat candidate for president in 1960. Two hundred and eighty-three Democrat Representatives and 64 Senators were asked the question. The man who looked so eagerly toward the 1960 nomination before the race for the governor's chair now is favored by only two of these hundreds of national leaders of the Democrat Party.

The fact is, there are seven Democrat Representatives and two Senators in all, nine Michigan Democrats in the Congress. There seems to have been seven who did not express a preference for your Governor.

I believe that is as close to the bottom as you can get, without an absolute zero.

Bagwell was a great candidate, and he had a sound issue.

He took on Walter Reuther's candidate for governor and cut him to size. A fifth-place man in his own state. The fact is, Paul Bagwell seems to have put Walter Reuther's candidate for president completely out of the running.

For this, Michigan citizens owe Paul Bagwell a great vote of thanks. The rest of us, across the Nation, owe Paul Bagwell and you Republican workers an even greater vote of thanks.

Now let us look a little more closely at the issue you Republicans had here in Michigan.

On the face of it, the issue looks like a simple bread-and-butter problem, something directly connected with the everyday problems of anyone in Michigan who works for a living.

Some who thought about the importance of this issue went no further in their thinking. They saw that the issue was genuine, and also that it spoke importantly to every man and woman in Michigan who worked, or who depended upon someone who worked. This was enough.

Now I invite you to review again with me, briefly, the genuineness of this issue, considered as a purely economic matter, for a constant effort is being made by the union political propagandists and the Governor to blur and confuse these facts.

Let me say now that the issue here in Michigan has two major aspects, as I see it. On the surface, and very immediately, it is an economic problem—one, as I have said, which touches very directly every citizen of the State. Underneath, and more important, it is a profoundly moral problem—one which touches vitally upon the civil rights of Michigan citizens.

As I talk to you tonight I am reminded of an evening more than a year ago when I stood before an audience of Michigan Republicans in Detroit. Will ycu forgive me if I recall briefly several things I mentioned that night, because they seem just as pertinent now?

A few years ago, in Washington, as some of us were reviewing the economic trends of the country as a whole, we were paying special attention to the great economic expansion in the country during the period 1950 to 1956, after the Korean war and under the new Republican administration. This period was before the recent recession from which the country is presently recovering.

Now, looking again at the period of great national economic expansion, from 1950 to 1956, we find that 46 States, big and small, increased their number of factory jobs. Almost no State was so backward that it was not carried along by the tremendous expansion.

Only two States in that period lost factory jobs. One was little Rhode Island. The other, surprisingly enough, was Michigan, a great industrial State which we in the rest of the country had come to look upon as a leader, certainly not as a backward and weak State.

Let me remind you that 1955 was the greatest year for the production of automobiles in the history of the industry. The whole Nation was reaching hungrily toward Michigan for more and more automobiles and trucks. Even 1956 was one of the best years in history for automobile sales.

This enormous national demand was directed right at Michigan and should have produced an unprecedented prosperity in the State.

Why, then, did the exact opposite take place? Why, instead of a great gain in factory jobs, was there an actual loss in jobs?

What sickness in this State could be so acute that even a great economic "blood transfusion" from the rest of the Nation would still leave Michigan anemic?

What was so unique about this sickness that not one other large industrial State was affected? Why, too, were even small and relatively undeveloped rural States, with no industry like automobiles to attract a national demand, nevertheless increasing factory jobs, while Michigan limped along at the end of the procession?

There was something profoundly wrong with Michigan's economy. That was clear.

We looked with surprise at this State of Michigan, propped up on all sides by the greatest demand for automobiles in the history of the country. How could Michigan be the only State in the whole Middle West to lose factory jobs, almost the only State in this country?

This was almost unbelievable, but it was true.

Now I have, for some years, had a special interest in the State of Michigan. Five years ago a group of Michigan union men came to see me in Washington, because I was on the Senate Labor Committee. They asked for help in solving some of their problems. They told me their civil rights were being undermined by certain politically ambitious union leaders in Michigan.

Now these men were strongly loyal to their union's economic objectives. But they felt that meddling in politics was not the job for union leaders, and they were afraid that they would end up by jeopardizing their economic gains unless certain ambitious union leaders could be kept out of politics.

Deeper still, these men resented having their union-dues money diverted into political slush funds. They had to pay dues to hold their jobs, but they did not believe they ought to have to pay dues money which their union leaders would use for politics, sometimes for candidates actually opposed at the polls by their own union members.

This, the union men told me, was an immoral thing. This, they said, was a basic attack on their civil rights.

I was impressed by the sincerity of these men from Michigan. They were not crackpots or union soreheads. They were solid, family men, one of them a member of the United Automobile Workers for 18 years. As Senator CURTIS and I listened, we could see their problem was real, and it was important.

As I began then to study the Michigan situation, I became more and more struck by the fact that there were elements in your problem here which were national in importance. Since then I have followed developments here very closely. I am convinced now that Michigan is being used as a laboratory, a testing ground, for something new in America, something, in my opinion, that is potentially deadly. And I believe this statement is conservative, based on a compelling array of facts.

The methods used in Michigan, and the results of these methods on the economy and especially on the civil rights of Michigan citizens give us a preview. A preview of what we may expect if these forces in Michigan spread their methods to the rest of the country.

It is Michigan's problem now, but it threatens to be soon the problem of the Nation. In fact, it has already spread to many parts of the country, but only in Michigan do we see this thing in its mature form. We can study here not only cause; we can study some of the results. Not all the results, mind you, because you may have worse to come in this State, if some strong measures are not taken.

Now we are talking about results. Let us look again at the disastrous economic record of Michigan in recent years.

We know that Michigan was the only State in the Middle West, one of only two States in the whole Nation which lost factory jobs between 1950 and 1956. I would remind you again that this was a period of unprecedented economic expansion throughout the Nation. I would remind you again, too, that Michigan's greatest industry, automobiles, was receiving an unheard of stimulus from a prosperous Nation at the very time jobs were disappearing from the State.

While the whole Nation was going forward, Michigan was going backward.

Why?

I believe I know the cause. Paul Bagwell spelled it out. But in the heat of a campaign a picture can be blurred. Statements and counterstatements can lead to confusion, doubt.

The political campaign is over, and it is time now to review again the facts.

Even now there are those who would deliberately confuse this picture. There are those, I regret to say, who have much at stake in covering up or distorting the actual facts.

The simple fact is that industry is fleeing from Michigan. And new industry which the State needs so badly is avoiding the State.

This is no temporary condition. This flight of industry is so great and so swift that it more than made up for the enormous demands made upon the automotive industry in 1955 and 1956. Some people who wish to confuse this picture for political purposes have tried to blame Michigan's economic predicament upon last year's national recession. How do these people account for the very great loss of jobs at the height of the national boom, before there was any sign of a national recession?

Michigan's problem arose before the recession. When the recession came, Michigan was the worst spot in the country. And now, with the rest of the Nation climbing swiftly again, a professor in your State university predicts that Michigan will still continue to have a large pool of unemployed. And for how long? For an indefinite period of time.

Michigan's problem arises within the State itself. That is clear. The attempt to blame Michigan's problem on the national administration was a shoddy political trick.

Nor can the problem, it seems, be related to the large role which the automobile industry plays in the Michigan economy. If this were true the State should have made great increases in factory jobs when the auto industry was at its peak in 1955, 1956, and 1957, which were respectively the first, the fourth, and the third best years in more than a half century of the automobile business. Instead, as we have seen, Michigan was losing jobs at this time.

What then is the cause?

Is this flight of industry and jobs due to an attempt by industry to escape paying Michigan's high wages? Well, it may be true in some cases that a combination of high wages and fringe benefits have put some Michigan business out of competition.

Such is not the case with the major losses you have suffered. The great automobile industry is moving out of Michigan to Ohio and Indiana. These are not low-wage States. Ohio, in fact, was the third highest wage-level in the United States.

I have read that the automobile industry has built 29 new plants in Ohio alone since the war. The industry is certainly not moving to Ohio and Indiana to escape high wages.

No, except for a few marginal cases, wage differential is not the cause for this flight of industry and jobs from Michigan.

Now, finally, there are some who deny entirely that Michigan industry is actually leaving the State. They claim that the whole issue is artificial. They say it is a trumped-up political issue, without any real substance.

Now I have received a very interesting study by Professor Jamison of the University of Michigan. Professor Jamison shows beyond question that Michigan, once a national leader, has, since 1948, been falling behind the Nation in many types of industry—in furniture manufacture, in pulp paper and paper products, in chemicals, in petroleum and coal products, in rubber products, in leather and leather goods, in stone clay and glass, in primary metal products, in fabricated metal products, in electrical machinery and in transportation equipment.

According to Professor Jamison's report, Michigan not only has lost leadership in industries for which the State was once famous. It goes far deeper than that, Michigan is steadily losing across a broad front, big industries, small industries, and across a broad range of manufacturing.

What is wrong with Michigan's economy is not limited to any special size or type of industry. No, this sickness is general.

Only a few miles from Saginaw you have a great chemical manufacturer, Dow, one of the greatest in the country. Once this was a Michigan industry. You know that this great company has expanded its facilities not so much in Michigan, but outside the State. So great has this outstate expansion been that now less than half of the total assets of the company remain in the State.

You all know this company. You know this outstate expansion to be true. Only recently in my study of your State did I learn of this fact.

No amount of political propaganda can hide facts of such magnitude and importance.

Now we have talked of industry leaving Michigan. What of industry searching for a location?

Is the sickness which is driving industry and jobs out of Michigan also keeping industry from coming into the State?

Since I last spoke in your State, somewhat more than a year ago, several studies have been developed which seem relevant. One was produced by an independent research organization in Chicago, Market Facts, Inc.; another was developed by McGraw-Hill Research for the magazine, Business Week. I found these studies told me a great deal about the attitudes of manufacturers toward coming into Michigan.

In each case the research organizations asked top manufacturing executives to list specific States they would consider if their company were going to select a site for a new plant.

The McGraw-Hill study received replies from 283 executives.

Now how did Michigan compare with other sites as a desirable plant site?

Of the 283 executives expresisng an opinion only 3 considered Michigan a first-choice location. Only 19 would give Michigan any consideration at all. When the size and importance and industrial history of Michigan is considered, I believe you will agree this reflects an attitude toward Michigan which could be disastrous to the economy of your State.

My own State of Arizona, relatively new in manufacturing, received almost twice as many first-choice mentions as did industrial Michigan.

Now let us turn to the Chicago study. Market Facts, Inc., interviewed 113 top manufacturing executives. They were asked to compare five Great Lakes States as desirable plant locations, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, and Wisconsin.

Market Facts asked the executives, as one question, to rate any one of the States as "worst." Do you know that every executive who gave a "worst" rating gave this rating to Michigan?

Now there is no doubt of the objectivity or the competence of either of these research organizations. Each has a national reputation, and each conducted their investigations with great safeguards to avoid bias of any kind.

Let us look at the opinions of these executives. Is there a possibility that their opinions would not necessarily be the same as their actions?

Well, there is a simple way to test their actions. We can look at actual plant construction in Michigan, and compare it with nearby States like Ohio and Indiana.

In the 2-year period, 1956–57, industrial contracts for construction in Indiana were a little short of $1 billion, $889,123,000. Ohio was larger with $921,678,000. This was a plant construction at the rate of $201 for each person in Indiana, $101 for each person in Ohio.

Michigan? Well Michigan's total plant construction in 1956 and 1957 was little more than a fifth that of Indiana or Ohio, and amounted to only $27 for each person in Michigan.

What does this mean to citizens of Michigan? It means that the plants not being built today will be the jobs that will die unborn tomorrow.

To the man looking for a job in Michigan today, this means no hope for new job opportunities tomorrow.

To the man who is paying taxes, the flight of industry and this failure of new industry to come into the States means this: The higher and higher taxes of Michigan will not be shouldered by a growing industry. The taxpayer will have to carry the additional burden which an expanding or incoming industry would otherwise have shared.

Now this is a bitter set of facts. And I hesitated long before deciding to address such an audience on facts which many of you must know better than I.

Yet I felt it might be useful for you to hear how these facts appear to an outsider—not entirely an outsider, I hope, since I have good friends in your State—but to one, not embroiled in the politics of your State, nor with any business interests here.

What facts I have seen convince me that your predicament is a matter not only of concern to Michigan but to the Nation. You are a great State, and what happens to you cannot be a matter of indifference to the rest of us.

Now, if you will be patient with me, I should like to proceed to the next step.

We have seen that the Michigan predicament is not due to the short-lived national recession, nor to the dominance of one industry in Michigan nor even to the lure of low-wage structures in other States.

We have seen that the Michigan predicament is very real and that there is a widespread conviction in the rest of the country that Michigan is no longer a good place in which to expand or to enter with a new manufacturing business. The McGraw-Hill and Market Facts studies clearly substantiate the fact that these opinions are widespread among manufacturing executives whose job it is to locate plant sites.

It does no good to try to hide these facts. Such facts cannot be hidden.

A doctor who tells a patient with cancer that he is suffering only from a slight stomach ache, to forget it, and it will go away, is doing his patient no favor.

The doctor who tells his patient the cold truth about the cancer gives the patient an opportunity to take realistic measures for a cure.

Now I would not presume to take the role of doctor for the State of Michigan. You have men here in this State who have been telling you the hard truth about your problem. Men who know a great deal more about your State than anyone from the outside could ever know.

It is very difficult for men who live here, who love this State, who have known its greatness, to tell the hard story of its present condition. It takes courage, and it takes integrity.

It is easier by far, especially for men who have more ambition than integrity, to repeat the empty optimistic things. Easier by far, and more popular, to say it is just a little passing stomach ache, or to pretend even that it does not exist at all.

To have a leader who takes this line is to have no leader at all, if the sickness is really acute. Such leadership is a kind of betrayal of trust.

Paul Bagwell said the hard things to the citizens of Michigan. He ran better in the recent election, not worse, because of this. He did not win, but he ran better than any Republican gubernatorial candidate in years. He will win the next time, because he deserves to.

As a man of integrity, as a responsible leader, he spoke the hard truths. The citizens of Michigan can trust a man like that.

We come then to the big question.

We know the great natural advantages of Michigan. We know of the great resources, the power, the skilled men. We know Michigan industry is close to great natural markets.

None of these economic advantages has disappeared.

Now, what has happened in Michigan? Your State has not lost any of the great resources, the great economic advantages it had 10 and 20 years ago.

I'll say tonight again what I said in Detroit over a year ago:

What is wrong with this State is not economic. It is political.

Some politicians in your State have feared that the real facts—the truth—might become apparent to the citizens of the State. Not only have they, in turn, denied the problem exists, they have also set up false causes, and then, finally, they have turned to deliberate obfuscation.

They have tried to make this problem look mysterious. I have read how they set up study committees ostensibly to find out what is causing the disastrous Michigan decline, but I cannot believe they are actually mystified by this problem. They know all too well the cause.

Well-intentioned people seem to have lent their names to these committees and, without intending to do so, have helped politicians to keep alive the myth that this is a mysterious thing. What do these committees accomplish? They have one major, but unexpressed objective—"to take the heat off" the politician.

Now it is not actually very difficult to find out why industry is leaving Michigan, and why other industry is staying out of the State.

In each of these industrial organizations there is a small group of responsible executives at the top who make such decisions. They know why they decide one way or the other. There is nothing mysterious about the process.

And I can tell you this. Their decisions have nothing to do with political partisanship. In my own State of Arizona, both houses of the legislature have heavy Democrat majorities. Yet Arizona is the most swiftly growing State in the Union, industrially. At the same time Michigan was declining in the number of factory jobs, between 1950 and 1956, the State of Arizona was increasing 130 percent.

No, responsible business leaders cannot afford the luxury of party bias when it comes to economic decisions. It is their responsibility to go where the business will thrive, stay out of areas where the business will be harmed.

It is not because your State administration is Democrat. It is because the Democrat Party in your State is a shell—merely a label—taken over by a special interest. That special interest is the United Automobile Workers. And I am not referring to the rank-and-file union members. I am referring to a few politically ambitious union leaders, men with a Socialist background.

These men own and operate the shell of a political party. They have retained only the Democrat label.

The key points in the party are manned by their crew. The machinery is fueled with union dues money from the general treasury of the United Automobile Workers.

This party in Michigan which still carries the label "Democrat" is so far to the left, so irresponsible, that even regular New Deal style Democrats find it very hard to accept.

Only last Friday Governor Docking, Democrat Governor of Kansas, made a public statement about the plight of Michigan. I saw the statement as reported in a Detroit paper. Docking said Michigan is completely broke because of a "bureaucracy" which has "run wild."

Now I ask you this, How bad does the situation have to be, for a New Deal Democrat to describe it as a bureaucracy which is running wild?

No, there is no mystery, no mystery at all, about the decision of business executives to move from this State, or to avoid the State, if they are already outside. No responsible executive could conscientiously expose his business to the hazards of a "bureaucracy running wild."

And I shall venture to suggest, furthermore, that businessmen would be better advised to avoid lending their names to committees set up to "take the heat off" leading politicians who are undermining a State's economy. May I suggest that such businessmen might better serve their State and their business by coming at once to grips with the real problem, which is political, and carrying the actual facts to the people. There is a responsibility to carry the whole story to the citizens of this State so that, better informed, they may make political decisions that are appropriate to the actual facts of their situation.

It can be understood why men in the business, for example, of selling industrial real estate might believe it in their short-run interest to obscure the real facts of Michigan's plight. It can also be understood why utilities executives whose rates are set by the State government, or leading educators on the State payroll, might find it difficult to resist an invitation from the executive office in Lansing to be listed on a committee, which is helpful to the public relations needs of the Governor.

How does any other businesman explain his presence on such a committee?

I have observed with interest the public statements of businessmen who declare their intention to get into politics. These expressions are very commendable. Businessmen, like all other citizens, should be informed and active citizens.

May I suggest as an elementary first step that these businessmen stop playing "footsie" with the forces of destruction? May I suggest that a little intestinal fortitude might be in order at this point?

Across America, in the fast-growing States, businessmen are getting into politics.

In my own State a successful businessman who had never held any political office ran for Governor and was elected Governor.

He fought a clean, hard fight, on principle. Imported union politicians threw everything they had at him and walked off the field with a bloody nose.

You are faced here in Michigan by a labor party, run by a small coterie of labor politicians, and disguised as the Democrat Party.

This political organization is completely ruthless and thoroughly irresponsible. The leaders of the organization make vital political decisions for this State, yet almost none of these decisions can be reached or influenced either by the voters, or by the union members.

Walter Reuther ran for public office only once. The voters had only one chance at him.

It was in 1937. Fresh from the violence of the sitdown strikes, flushed with victory, Reuther thought his prestige as a union leader could be transformed into political power.

Reuther and four other top officials of the union decided to run for city council in Detroit. And what happened? All were defeated.

Reuther ran 15th, out of 18 candidates.

I don't know what was wrong with the three who ran behind him. They must have been objectionable in the extreme.

The union members in Detroit wanted Reuther as union leader; they rejected him as a political leader. This same Walter Reuther who could not be elected to the city council of Detroit, now goes to the national convention of the Democrat Party and exercises a veto over the nominations to the Democrat national ticket.

His is the hidden hand behind the policies in the State of Michigan which have brought this great industrial State to its knees, on the verge of bankruptcy.

The stranglehold of the labor politicians on the State of Michigan is a well known fact to businessmen across the country.

Just a year ago the representative of one of the greatest industrial organizations in America cleared the air—took all the supposed mystery out of this situation. The occasion was a meeting of industrial development people and manufacturers from five neighboring States of Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Ohio, and Michigan.

This industrialist told how industry is searching all over the United States for good plant sites. In Ohio, his company has built no less than 19 new plants in the last 5 years. In Michigan they have built only one. They are not planning, he said, to build any more in Michigan.

When he was asked why his company had decided not to build further in Michigan, he said, "Because of your labor government."

There was nothing mysterious about this decision.

Nor is there any doubt that this one industrial decision alone cost Michigan tens of thousands of jobs.

It does not seem to me to be necessary to set up a committee in an effort to discover what this man meant.

It is there, on the face of it.

What is necessary, is that the people of Michigan be given the facts.

Representative government is only sound when the political decisions are made by informed voters.

The great State of Michigan is bankrupt.

The executive is asking for new taxes which are estimated to add $38 to $40 million in taxes to the burden already carried by business and industry. How many more industries will decide to leave because of this new tax burden, no one can say.

The supreme court of your State of Michigan is adding its own special kind of nightmare to the businessman. A former United Automobile Workers organizer, now a justice on your supreme court bench, has just written an opinion which may, in effect, compel industry to finance strikes out of unemployment compensation funds.

This is the final touch. To convert the unemployment compensation fund into a strike fund, financed by industry.

If this trend continues, I venture to predict an increase in the departure of industry from Michigan. As your budgets and your debt become steadily larger, the industrial base which should provide tax revenue will grow smaller.

You will have larger and larger budgets on a smaller and smaller industrial base.

The man whose birthday we are honoring once spoke of such a situation.

Lincoln put it this way: "As an individual who undertakes to live by borrowing soon finds his original means devoured by interest, and next, no one left to borrow from; so must it be with a government."

It was true when Lincoln said it; the same is true today.

Lincoln Day is a mighty good time for us to be honest with ourselves. We must face and acknowledge our problems—not only in Michigan but across the Nation—if we are to solve them.

I can think of no better resolution for today in Michigan than to carry out to the people this idea of the greatest Republican of them all.

You have a great worthwhile task. The future of your State is truly at stake.

The economic problems of this State have an evil political root and it might well be the dedicated purpose of you all here tonight, as citizens first, and secondly as Republicans, to root out this evil cause of your great State's present discontent.

Every natural economic advantage which Michigan ever had, it still has. The economic problem of Michigan originates in a perversion of Michigan politics.

The problem can only be cured by sound political leadership.

In the final analysis, each citizen will solve the economic problem of Michigan alone—in the voting booth.

I wish you well. For success you will need some of the firmness, the devotion to truth, the dedication we knew in Lincoln.

Your task is formidable.

But the energy, the spirit, the inventiveness that always has characterized Michigan—this has not left the State of Michigan. You have not exported your courage.

The character it took to build this great State, will not fail to meet the present challenge.

You can do it.

Across the Nation, we others who are proud to follow in the tradition of Lincoln will be with you in spirit.

A great responsibility rests on you here in Michigan. For what happens here today can happen to the whole Nation tomorrow.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1959

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, God, and our fathers' God:

On this day hallowed by a grateful Nation, the towering form of one who has left his image and superscription forever upon our national life, being dead, yet speaketh.

With clamorous voices out of the present demanding our ears, we would listen again to the calm and reassuring voice of one who was Thy instrument in fashioning the fabric of our freedom. May his warning sentiments bequeathed for the meditation of all future generations come to us with undimmed freshness as a message for these turbulent times.

By patience and faith may we, like him, rise above the dangers and difficulties which confront us, as in this day of desperate battle his unsheathed sword inspires those who fight for the things of the spirit wherever liberty is challenged and imperiled by tyranny.

So, as the ages roll on, may the Nation which calls him father cherish the luster of Washington's selfless service and the greatness of his unsullied character.

We ask it in the name of the Christ he adored, at whose pierced feet he laid his all. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 19, 1959, was dispensed with.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order of January 24, 1901, Washington's Farewell Address will now be read to the Senate. The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] was previously designated by the Vice President to read the address today.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT advanced to the desk and read the Farewell Address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, suffering, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they addressed themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter. Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and maintaining within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only, that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be involved, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit or party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasion of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes, that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties), ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessary parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interest.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith: Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collusions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe; my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

"We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, respectfully represent and petition as follows:

"Whereas U.S. Highway 99 is the main avenue of communication between the new 49th State, Alaska, and the United States; and

"Whereas, U.S. Highway 99 extends from Alaska through Washington, Oregon, and California to Mexico and is classified as an international highway; and

"Whereas U.S. Highway 99 has been designated as an integral portion of the new 'National System of Interstate and Defense Highways,' and hereinafter referred to as the Interstate Highway System; and

"Whereas almost 50 percent of all tourist traffic coming into the State of Washington comes over the interstate bridge at Vancouver, Wash.; and

"Whereas there is now no toll road, toll bridge or other toll charge anywhere along this important highway; and

"Whereas for defense purposes the members of the headquarters of the 104th Reserve Infantry Division and the members of the headquarters of the Oregon Military Reserve District must cross the interstate bridge to report for duty at Vancouver Barracks; and

"Whereas a toll on said interstate bridge will be imposed upon the completion of the raising of the old bridge and would impair the free flow of interstate commerce between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington; and

"Whereas bonds for the Portland-Vancouver interstate bridges were sold, the contracts let and preliminary engineering phases of construction began 3 months prior to when the President signed the Federal Highway and Highway Revenue Acts of 1956, and therefore the interstate bridge between Vancouver, Wash., and Portland, Oreg., was not able to come under the Federal Highway and Revenue Act of 1956; and

"Whereas many workers who reside in Portland and Vancouver commute from one State to another and have invested in homes on the basis of a free bridge existing between the two States; and

"Whereas a toll bridge in this area would cause an economic emergency due to the necessity of a great number of residents having to sell their homes and move from one State to the other; and

"Whereas substantial costs of said bridge were due to the improvement of navigation of the Columbia River and traditionally these costs have been borne by the Federal Government in improving the free flow of commerce up and down a navigable stream and between States; and

"Whereas the State of Washington is engaged in industrial expansion and said toll would interfere with present industries and the possibility of new industry coming into the State; and

"Whereas the third largest industry in the State of Washington is the tourist trade which would be impaired by said toll; and

"Whereas it is believed that the intent of Congress in passing the new Federal Interstate Highway System was to make said system free of tolls and encourage the free flow of commerce and people; and

"Whereas section 109 of the Federal Highway and Highway Revenue Acts of 1956 (Public Law 627, approved June 29, 1956) provides in part as follows:

"'It is hereby declared to be the intent and policy of the Congress to equitably reimburse those States for any portion of a highway which is on the Interstate System, whether toll or free, the construction of which has been completed subsequent to August 2, 1947, or which is either in actual use or under construction by contract, for completion, awarded not later than June 30, 1957 and such highway meets the standards required by this title for the Interstate System. * * *;

"'It is also declared to be the policy and intent of the Congress to provide funds necessary to make such reimbursements to the State as may be determined': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully memorialize and petition the President of the United States to recommend and the Congress of the United States to enact legislation clarifying the provisions of the Federal Highway and Highway Revenue Acts of 1956 for the purpose of having that portion of the Interstate Highway System known as the Portland-Vancouver Interstate Bridge continue to be operated as the toll-free bridge, and that the costs of improving navigation on the Columbia River and improving the existing highway be borne and paid for out of funds provided by the Congress from gas taxes and other revenues for the Interstate Highway System; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Honorable Dwight D. VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITALS IN GEORGIA—RESOLUTION

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Georgia memorializing Congress to increase facilities in hospitals for veterans in the State of Georgia.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 157

Resolution relating to Veterans' Administration hospitals in Georgia; and for other purposes

Whereas the Veterans' Administration Hospital, located on Peachtree Road in Atlanta, contains only 300 beds and was originally constructed to take care of veterans only of World War I, and since that time, the United States has been engaged in World War II and the Korean conflict, adding thousands of veterans to those from World War I; and

Whereas there are approximately 150,000 veterans living within a 50-mile radius of Atlanta, and the present hospital is woefully inadequate for this number of veterans; and

Whereas it is imperative that a new hospital for veterans be constructed in the Atlanta area to relieve these conditions; and

Whereas many veterans are not being cared for in other areas of Georgia, and the Veterans' Administration Hospital located at Dublin, Ga. has approximately 1,000 beds, of which only about one-half are being utilized; and

Whereas it would be of untold benefit to veterans and the State of Georgia if the remaining beds were placed in use: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of Georgia, That the Veterans' Administration is hereby urged and requested to construct a new Veterans' Administration Hospital in the Atlanta area and to utilize the entire facilities of the Hospital in Dublin; be it further

Resolved, That the members of the Georgia congressional delegation are hereby urged to continue their efforts to bring about the aforesaid; be it further

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to each member of the Georgia congressional delegation, to the presiding officers of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the U.S. Congress, to the President of the United States and to the proper officials of the Veterans' Administration.

In senate: Read and adopted February 12, 1959.

GEORGE D. STEWART,
Secretary.

In house: Read and adopted February 10, 1959.

GLENN W. ECCARD,
Clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

RESOLUTION OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF TENNESSEE

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, House Joint Resolution 16, adopted by the House of Representatives of the State of Tennessee recommending that the report prepared by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce for disposal of the Tennessee Valley Authority, be rejected and condemned as unsound, unfair, and impractical in its attack on the TVA and indirectly upon the national defenses of the United States.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Works and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 16

Whereas the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has issued a biased and inaccurate report entitled "TVA: What's Next" which proposed that TVA be dismembered, dispersed, and its power facilities sold; and

Whereas the TVA Board promptly and categorically refuted the above report and denounced it as a "misrepresentation of TVA and a disservice to the general public and the members of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce"; and

Whereas the action proposed by the U.S. Chambers of Commerce report would destroy a great public agency whose retention and growth is vitally essential to the welfare of the seven-State Valley area, and moreover, since a vast amount of its generated power is channeled into atomic energy and allied defense industries, its preservation and continuance is absolutely necessary to a strong and vigorous national defense program; and

Whereas it is proper that the 1959 General Assembly of the State of Tennessee take action on this paramount issue: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 81st General Assembly of Tennessee (the Senate concurring), That the report prepared by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's natural resources department, as titled in the preamble hereof, be forthwith rejected and the action suggested by said report be condemned as unsound, unfair, and impractical in its attack on the Tennessee Valley Authority and indirectly upon the national defenses of the United States; be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the members of the Tennessee delegation to Congress, and to the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Adopted: January 28, 1959.

JAMES L. BOMOR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WM. D. BAIRD,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved: February 4, 1959.

BUFORD ELLINGTON,
Governor.

RESOLUTION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF STATE OF GEORGIA

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the General Assembly of Georgia unanimously has adopted a resolution memorializing Congress to call a convention for the purpose of considering the constitutional amendment I have proposed to restore State and local control over public schools.

I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be received and appropriately referred and that the text of it be printed herewith in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 99

Resolution memorializing Congress to call a convention for the purpose of considering an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the administration by the several States of their respective school systems; and for other purposes

Whereas recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have tended to withdraw from the sovereign States power to administer their respective school systems in a fashion never contemplated or intended by the ratifiers of the Constitution; and

Whereas the unconscionable usurpation of power has caused much dissension, discord, and disagreement, not only among the several States in the Union, but among the races, and tends to destroy the very basis of the sovereignty of the several States; and

Whereas the enforcement of the decisions of the Supreme Court has led to bloodshed and tends to endanger public education throughout the several States of the Union; and

Whereas the statehood bill admitting Alaska to the Union provides that administrative control of the public schools shall be vested exclusively in such State; and

Whereas the junior Senator of the State of Georgia, Hon. HERMAN E. TALMADGE, has proposed an amendment to the Federal Constitution to grant to the several States the same right to control its public school system as has been granted to Alaska, in which this body concurs unanimously; and

Whereas, it is desirable that such amendment not provide for a local option, as to political subdivisions less than the States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of Georgia, That the Congress of the United States be petitioned and is hereby petitioned to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"ARTICLE—

"SECTION 1. Administrative control of any public school, public educational institution, or public educational system, operated by any State or by any political or other subdivision thereof, shall be vested exclusively in such State and subdivision, and nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to deny the residents thereof the right to determine for themselves the manner in which any school institution or system is administered by such State and subdivision"; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be and it hereby is requested to provide the mode of ratification that said amendment shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States; be it further

Resolved, That a duly attested copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of the Congress in the State of Georgia; be it further

Resolved, That a duly attested copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Governor of every State of the Union, the president of the State senate of every State, and the speaker of the house of representatives of every State, for the express purpose of encouraging the several sovereign States to take similar action in their legislatures to encourage the adoption of the foregoing amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIA'S INDEPENDENCE—RESOLUTION

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the American citizens of Lithuania in commemoration of the 41st anniversary of Lithuania's independence.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution unanimously adopted, after due deliberation, by the American citizens of Lithuanian descent of the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois, at the commemoration of the 41st anniversary of Lithuania's independence, held under the auspices of the Lithuanian Council of Chicago at Maria High School Auditorium on the 15th day of February 1959:

"Whereas the American people continue to believe in certain inalienable principles enunciated in the American Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, the Atlantic Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Charter of the United Nations; and

"Whereas the people of Lithuania, firmly espousing the selfsame principles in their declaration of independence promulgated in 1918, have won their liberty by valiant fight against oppressors and, during 22 peaceful years, against seemingly insurmountable odds, converted war-devastated Lithuania into a prosperous and progressive country; and

"Whereas, in 1940, Soviet Russia, in conspiracy with Hitlerite Germany and in consistent and unilateral violation of all the treaties and declarations solemnly underwritten by it, viz., Peace and Non-Aggression Pacts with the Baltic States, occupied Lithuania and annexed her to the Soviet Union, and, in 1944, following the defeat of the German armies on the Eastern front, again took over that country, in complete disregard of the wartime policies and obligations under the Atlantic Charter and the Charter of the United Nations to which Soviet Russia is a cosignatory with the United States and other allied countries; and

"Whereas a major part of Europe, the cradle of modern civilization, and Asia, the most populous continent, lies today under the sway of lawless rule by the militant communism which, eagerly looking for new victims, continues rearing its ugly head in other adjacent areas; and

"Whereas the Communist conspiracy, by unprecedented and unorthodox methods has infiltrated deep into the still free world, using any deceit or strategem to further its ideological, psychological, or subversive attack upon every strata of free world society including education, art, press, labor, industry, agriculture, and government; and

"Whereas military preparedness of the free nations alone or together with isolated attempts to counter Communist aggression are not adequate to cope with the global Kremlin strategy and its unorthodox methods: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the patriotic American citizens of Lithuanian descent of Chicago, Ill., having carefully reviewed the events of the recent past and the deplorable state of international affairs at the beginning of the year 1959, respectfully submit to the President, Secretary of State, and Members of Congress of the United States:

"That the Government of the United States continue, in true American tradition, a vigorous and consistent policy to effectively confront the global and centrally controlled Kremlin conspiracy for world subjugation;

"That the Government of the United States utilize its leadership in political, military and economic world affairs to the benefit of mankind by providing a wise and coordinated leadership to the nations of the Western Hemisphere in their struggle to resist Communist imperialism;

"That the Government of the United States enlist the cooperation of the great potential anti-Communist force among the several hundreds of millions of the enslaved by employing all suitable means and measures, but avoiding premature and abortive uprisings, to assist the subjugated peoples to coordinate their fight for survival;

"That the Government of the United States, through its representatives in the United Nations strongly oppose the consideration and/or adoption of the 'Draft Code of Offenses Against the Peace and Security of Mankind,' as submitted by the Secretary General of the United Nations, which code in its present form would prohibit oppressed persons and organizations wrongfully enslaved by an aggressor nation to work and fight for their freedom and the restoration of their government to their own people and further said code destroys the agreements reached at the 'genocide convention' and ratified by the United Nations.

"That the Government of the United States insist upon the sanctity of treaties, much advertised by Soviet spokesmen since 1939, and invoke the authority of the United Nations to demand that the Soviet Government conform its policies to the principles of the Atlantic Charter and United Nations Charter solemnly underwritten by it, as well as honor its prewar international obligations under the peace treaties and nonaggression and friendship pacts concluded by the Soviet Union with the Republics of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, by withdrawing military and police forces and Communist Party apparatus from the occupied territories so that the people may freely fashion governments of their own choosing; be it further

"Resolved, That the Lithuanian Americans of Chicago, Ill., reaffirming their pledge of cooperation with the Government of the United States in its efforts to bring about peace, stability and prosperity in the world, express greatest appreciation and gratitude: To the President of the United States and his administration for steadfast adherence to the principles of morality and democracy in international relations and for the support extended to the cause of independence of Lithuania; to individual distinguished Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives who, on numerous occasions, have lent their moral encouragement to and sympathy with the Baltic and other persecuted peoples."

LITHUANIAN AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHICAGO,
ALFONSE F. WELLS, President.
EUPHROSINE MIKUZIS, Secretary.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, each February the people of the United States pay devout homage to two individuals, two great Presidents of our Nation, who are admired around the world for their sacrifices and devotion to the cause of independence and self-determination of mankind.

It is therefore exceedingly tragic that the month of February also is cause for the deepest regret that a once-free and proud nation, Lithuania, still is suffering under the heel of despotism. The passage of February 16, 1959, marked the 41st anniversary of the date when the Lithuanian National Council proclaimed the restoration of an independent nation whose life in tranquility and freedom lamentably was doomed to only a few brief years.

Lithuania stands as a shocking symbol of the ruthlessness of tyrannical communism. But the fires of liberty still burn behind the Iron Curtain. The long history of Lithuania, dating back to the 11th century and marked by repeated periods of suppression and subjugation, affords reason for hope that once again these courageous people will enjoy an independent, democratic existence.

Lithuania demonstrated for the world, during the shockingly brief span of freedom, 1918 to 1940, her right to stand with the free nations of the world.

The United States can do little materially at this time to aid Lithuania in regaining that rightful position. But the people of America, committed to the great principles which brought a free Lithuania into being 41 years ago, can nourish the ambitions and spiritually reinforce the determination of present-day victims of the Communist dictators to reestablish an independent nation. Our country for 18 years steadfastly has refused to acknowledge the despotic annexation of Lithuania and sister Baltic States by Soviet Russia during the early days of World War II and we must never acquiesce in the subjugation of the long-suffering Lithuanian people.

RESOLUTIONS OF CITY COUNCIL OF MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that three resolutions adopted by the City Council of Minneapolis on February 13, 1959, be printed at this point in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolutions were received, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"RESOLUTION URGING THE U.S. CONGRESS TO PROVIDE ADEQUATE FEDERAL RESOURCES FOR URBAN RENEWAL

"Whereas urban renewal is a major need in the city of Minneapolis; and

"Whereas this city, like many other cities, has initiated a number of urban renewal projects, relying on the continuation of substantial Federal financial support; and

"Whereas the city is unable to carry out these projects with its own fiscal resources; and

"Whereas it is unlikely that the State of Minnesota would add to its already overburdened budgets for aids to local governments for urban renewal purposes; and

"Whereas the American Municipal Association, of which Minneapolis is a direct member, has endorsed the continuation of adequate Federal grants for such purposes: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the City Council of the City of Minneapolis, That the U.S. Congress be urged to adopt financial measures which will increase Federal support for urban renewal above the level proposed in the administrative budget.

"RESOLUTION URGING THE U.S. CONGRESS TO PROVIDE ADEQUATE FEDERAL RESOURCES FOR AIRPORT IMPROVEMENTS

"Whereas the city of Minneapolis is contributing heavily towards a large expansion program at the metropolitan area, and in support of a number of public airports in this area; and

"Whereas the construction of airports, improvement of facilities and installation of controls and safety measures are of great interstate importance; and

"Whereas the growing, purely local needs already require more city financial resources than are available; and

"Whereas it is unlikely that adequate financial support needed for metropolitan airport operation and development can come from the State of Minnesota in the face of the State's own budget balancing problems: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the City Council of the City of Minneapolis, That the U.S. Congress be urged to adopt financial measures which will increase Federal support for airport construction and improvement above the level proposed in the administration's budget.

To the Committee on Appropriations:

"RESOLUTION URGING THE U.S. CONGRESS TO PROVIDE ADEQUATE APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI HARBOR AT ST. ANTHONY FALLS IN MINNEAPOLIS

"Whereas the city of Minneapolis has met its obligations under the act of Congress authorizing the Upper Mississippi Harbor project at St. Anthony Falls by appropriating $300,000 each year since 1941 out of local property tax resources; and

"Whereas the aggregate of these local appropriations amounting to nearly $6 million have been applied to securing right-of-way required by the Federal Government in the harbor improvement, and to necessary bridge raising, constructing, and reconstruction; and

"Whereas it is important in the future development of Minneapolis that the harbor project be completed as soon as possible; and

"Whereas Senator HUMPHREY has announced that the Army Engineers can effectively and efficiently spend more than is currently proposed for the Upper Mississippi Harbor project in the administration's budget, and that he will seek a larger appropriation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the City Council of the City of Minneapolis, That the U.S. Congress be urged to adopt appropriation measures which will expedite the completion of the Upper Mississippi Harbor project at St. Anthony Falls in Minneapolis to the maximum degree, supported by proof that the Army Engineers can spend enlarged appropriations effectively and efficiently.

"Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be sent forthwith, to the President, Vice President, Speaker of the House, and to each Member of the House and Senate in the congressional delegation from Minnesota.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954, RELATING TO OCCUPATIONAL TAXES ON CERTAIN FIREARMS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill relating to the proration of the occupational tax on persons dealing in certain firearms.

During the summer and fall, representatives of the National Rifle Association, Sporting Arms and Ammunition Manufacturers Institute, the American Gun Dealers Association, the Washington Police Department, and gun collectors met with officials of the Treasury Department on several occasions, and agreed on the provisions of this proposed legislation. It was drafted by the Treasury Department, and has been introduced in the House by Representatives KING of California, SIKES of Florida, SAYLOR of Pennsylvania, SMITH of California, and MICHEL of Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1150) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to eliminate the proration of the occupational tax on persons dealing in machineguns and certain other firearms, to reduce occupational and transfer taxes on certain weapons, to make the transferor and transferee jointly liable for the transfer tax on firearms, and to make certain changes in the definition of a firearm, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

INSURANCE AGAINST COSTS OF HOSPITAL AND NURSING HOME SERVICE FOR ELDER CITIZENS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Social Security Act so as to provide insurance against the costs of hospital and nursing home service for our elder citizens.

One of the most important and pressing social problems which we face today is finding means to insure a life of dignity and decency for our older citizens.

The number of Americans over 65 years of age has been steadily mounting. While at the turn of the century there were only 3 million over 65, today it is estimated that there are more than 14 million.

The income of our elder citizens is in most cases very low. The latest figures available—those of 1954—show that half of the families whose head was 65 or over had cash incomes of less than $2,000, and two-thirds of individuals over 65 who were living alone or with nonrelatives had a cash income of less than $1,000.

The problems faced by the elderly with but limited incomes are only too obvious. Adequate housing, medical care, clothing, and food are items which immediately come to mind.

We in this great and wealthy country have a social and moral obligation to provide adequate means whereby the elderly may enjoy a decent standard of living and may be free of constant anxiety over what will happen in time of serious illness.

I am very much pleased that the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has appointed a subcommittee for the purpose of studying the problems of our older citizens. Such a study is sorely needed. I know the new Subcommittee on Problems of the Aged and Aging, under the able chairmanship of the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], will do an excellent job. From this study will come, I am sure, many fine and practical suggestions.

High on the list of problems of the elderly is that of adequate hospital and nursing home services. The purpose of the bill which I introduce today is to help meet this problem by providing that our Nation's social security program include insurance to cover the costs of such services for our older citizens.

The need for such an insurance program is apparent when we examine the statistics which show that only two out of five of our older citizens have any form of health insurance whatsoever, and much of this insurance is quite limited, and can be canceled at any time.

During the time a person is in his earning years, he often can provide for such contingencies through voluntary organizations that provide hospital care on an insurance plan. The wide group coverage at many places of employment may bring such a program within his financial reach. Yet, when he retires, or when his providing days come to an end, he and his spouse face the possibility of hospital expenses with a dual handicap. On the one hand, their income is suddenly and substantially reduced; on the other, their right to group coverage in hospital insurance plans is lost, and the cost of private insurance plans is often beyond their reach. When sickness strikes, many are left with two alternatives, either to forego the desired treatment and suffer, or apply for public assistance. If the latter, the regular welfare funds are diminished or the overburdened hospitals are denied repayment for their services.

How much more logical it would be to provide a hedge against the additional hazards of hospital expense by incorporating an insurance plan to take care of it into our already operating national old-age and survivors program.

The hospital and nursing home insurance program which I am proposing would be financed by increasing the present Social Security tax on employees and employers by one-fourth percent each, and on the self-employed by three-eighths percent.

Mr. President, at this point I wish to pay tribute to the Honorable AIME J. FORAND, of Rhode Island, who is sponsoring in the other body House bill 4700, which is similar in some respects to my bill.

Mr. President, permit me to explain a few of the details of my own bill.

It would make persons eligible for hospital and nursing home benefits if they are eligible for old-age insurance, regardless of whether they have yet applied for it. Certainly, it would be undesirable to compel our elder citizens to stop working, in order to qualify for such benefits, if they feel that continued work will be socially constructive and advantageous to them.

This hospital and nursing home insurance program would entitle those eligible to up to 60 days of hospital care, with subsequent nursing home care, if necessary, up to a combined total of 120 days in any one year. Benefits included are hospital services, drugs, appliances, and care ordinarily furnished to patients in semi-private accommodations. Persons certified by a physician as needing the care could choose any hospital that admits them and that had contracted with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to furnish the services. Tuberculosis and mental hospitals are not covered, and hospital care received under workmen's compensation statutes would not be reimbursed by this insurance.

If a physician directed that nursing home care was needed for a condition that had required hospitalization, this would also be covered. Nursing home service would include skilled nursing care, related medical and personal services, and accompanying bed and board provided by a licensed nursing home operated in connection with a hospital or in which a medical doctor directs the care.

Positive prohibition of any direction of hospital activities is specified in the act.

If effective and economical administration of hospital insurance can be achieved through private, nonprofit insurance organizations, the Secretary is authorized to contract with them to provide it.

Hospital insurance payments under the bill would begin in the 12th month after the bill is enacted. It is estimated that 12 to 13 million persons would be eligible for coverage.

Mr. President, I have outlined the provisions of the amendments I am suggesting in this bill to the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program. The bill also, of course, includes changes in the Internal Revenue Code, so as to include the wage and payroll tax increases necessary to finance the program.

The provisions of this bill are modest; they are deliberately limited in scope, in order to facilitate enactment of this much-needed measure in 1959. They deal with social insurance only.

Mr. President, in my opinion, this proposal should be enacted this year. I believe enactment of the bill is necessary in order to meet one of the major deficiencies in our welfare program. I believe the bill is realistic, in that it is a modest effort to handle this problem within our presently established social security system. I believe the bill is financially sound, in that it will be financed by the earning power of those who stand to benefit. I trust that my colleagues will join in this effort to meet the continuing challenge of meaningful social security.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1511) to amend the Social Security Act and the Internal Revenue Code so as to provide insurance against the costs of hospital and nursing home service for persons eligible for old-age and survivors insurance benefits, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

COMPENSATION TO STATE OF OREGON FOR FIRE FIGHTING COSTS ON DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR LAND

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I am reintroducing a bill to compensate the State of Oregon for fire-fighting costs incurred by the State in extinguishing a forest fire on lands administered by the Department of Interior, This bill is identical to Senate bill 2601, which I sponsored in the previous session of Congress. I am introducing this bill at the request of officials of my State; and, despite the adverse reports by the Department of Interior, I am convinced of the merits and the equities of my State's case.

The Bureau of Land Management has over 2 million acres of forest land in western Oregon. Unlike the Forest Service the Bureau does not directly provide fire protection for these lands. The Bureau of Land Management lands are intermingled with private and State lands. In 1951, there was a catastrophic fire which burned almost 28,000 acres, including 11,000 acres of Bureau of Land Management lands. This fire originated on Bureau of Land Management lands, and cost half a million dollars to extinguish. The State has attempted to collect for the deficit incurred in fighting this fire, and it is the position of the officials of Oregon that the Federal Government has a responsibility to contribute $184,101.89.

Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to compensate the State of Oregon for costs of fighting the Vincent Creek Forest fire on lands administered by the Department of Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1153) to compensate the State of Oregon for fire-fighting costs, introduced by Mr. NEUBERGER (for himself and Mr. MORSE), by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HEARINGS FOR LITIGANTS IN CASES REVIEWED BY SUPREME COURT

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I view with grave concern the increasing tendency of the Supreme Court of the United States to act upon lower court decisions without hearing oral arguments on the points at issue.

There is nothing in the rules of the Supreme Court authorizing the determination of cases without oral arguments unless they are waived by the parties concerned. Yet, during the 1957–58 term that tribunal acted without benefit of hearings in a total of 153 cases.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the list of those cases as compiled at my request by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress be printed at this juncture of my remarks.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I am as opposed to gag rule in our courts as I am to gag rule in our legislative chambers. Freedom of speech and the right to be heard are inherent in our American tradition and when they are infringed upon it is the duty of Congress to provide an immediate remedy through the legislative process.

It is my conviction, Mr. President, that the ends of full justice are not being served by the present procedures of the Supreme Court, and it is out of that deep conviction that I herewith introduce for appropriate reference a bill to add a new paragraph to chapter 133 of title 28 of the United States Code, which would read as follows:

The Supreme Court shall not upon review of any case affirm, modify, vacate, set aside, or reverse any judgment, decree, or order of any court unless each party to such case has been accorded full opportunity for hearing thereon before the Supreme Court, including opportunity for the presentation of oral argument before such Court.

I believe it is in the best interests of all Americans, Mr. President, that such a law be enacted at the earliest possible time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1155) to require that litigants in cases reviewed by the Supreme Court be accorded an opportunity for hearing before that Court, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. TALMADGE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENCOURAGEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF PETROLEUM AND COAL RESERVES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators MURRAY, CHAVEZ, CARROLL, MCGEE, BYRD of West Virginia, YARBOROUGH, MANSFIELD, BIBLE, and ALLOTT, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to encourage the development of petroleum and coal reserves within the United States. The bill has been endorsed by some 10 Senators. I ask unanimous consent that it may lie on the desk until the last session of the Senate to be held this week, for endorsement by other Senators who may be interested in this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk in accordance with the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

The bill (S. 1157) to encourage the development of petroleum and coal reserves within the United States, introduced by Mr. O'MAHONEY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, we honor the memory of George Washington today while the Nation he founded faces one of the greatest crises of human freedom in all the history of mankind. We honor him as the founder of the first government of the people, all of the people, ever established on earth.

That government is now confronted in a worldwide economic struggle with a modern dictatorship more powerful than any ever before established. The issue in truth and in fact is liberty against slavery.

The Prime Minister of Great Britain, Harold Macmillan, is today in Moscow talking with the Soviet dictator on behalf of our most powerful ally in the modern struggle for freedom. That dictator has served notice upon all who believe in human freedom that the forces of freedom must leave Western Berlin before the end of May. This is the sort of ultimatum out of which shooting wars are made, and our own President, only last week, recognizing this danger, said himself that if shooting results in Berlin it will have to be begun by the Communists.

OIL IMPORTS FOUND TO THREATEN NATIONAL SECURITY

If war comes, the United States and the free world will need all the fuel resources we can command. This Government is the strongest of all the free nations. It is the strongest militarily; it is the strongest economically. It cannot afford to allow its energy resources to be weakened while we are actually engaged in the cold war with communism and while the shooting war obviously threatens. As long ago as February 1955 the President's Advisory Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources formally advised the President that the national security of this country had been endangered by the growing importation into the United States of petroleum and petroleum products, including residual fuel. As a consequence, a section was written into the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Extension Act to authorize the President to restrict imports of petroleum and petroleum products when the national security is threatened.

PRESIDENT ISSUES ORDER FOR VOLUNTARY RESTRICTION

On April 23, 1957, Gordon Grey, then Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, certified to the President that the "whole field of petroleum and its products" required action, and later he recommended to the President that he instruct his special Presidential Committee on Imports to be governed accordingly. The President then issued the first restrictive order.

IMPORTS INCREASE

In the face of this order establishing a voluntary restriction of imports, the importation of petroleum and petroleum products increased rather than diminished. In 1955 the net importation of petroleum and its products amounted to 881,000 barrels a day. In 1958, 3 years later, after the first voluntary order had been revised by a second order, the net imports had reached a level of 1,370,000 barrels a day. That was an increase of almost half a million barrels every 24 hours.

OIL AND COAL INDUSTRIES SUFFER, AS DOES GOVERNMENT'S INCOME

In the meantime the domestic petroleum industry was deteriorating. The coal industry was likewise deteriorating. There is within the boundaries of the United States a productive capacity of approximately 3 million barrels per day which are shut in because increasing importations have robbed domestic producers of their market.

At the same time, unemployment has been increasing in the coal-producing areas of the United States. The steady decline of the production of petroleum and petroleum products and of coal in the United States, with its resulting unemployment, is reducing the tax receipts of the United States because it is reducing the activity of two most important industries. This reduction of tax receipts by the Government comes at the very time when the United States is under obligation to expend billions in the national defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The time of the Senator from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understood that the Senator from Wisconsin had yielded time to me. I ask unanimous consent that I may conclude these remarks.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. For the information of Senators, is the Senate still in the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is still in the morning hour.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was under the impression that morning business had been concluded.

I ask unanimous consent that I may conclude these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

IN A WAR WE WOULD NEED OUR OWN RESOURCES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is impossible to overestimate the importance of preserving to our country in this crisis the readiness to produce its petroleum and coal resources. This is no time to permit investments abroad of American capital, valuable though they are in times of peace, to blind us so that we cannot see the importance of preserving self-sufficiency at home in the materials like petroleum and coal which are essential to the waging of war. Hitler taught us in World War II how his submarines could shut off even South American supplies of petroleum and its products. It is no protection to the United States against a third world war that huge deposits of petroleum lie at the eastern extremities of the Mediterranean Sea or elsewhere in the Old World. We know that Nikita Khrushchev has command of modern submarines in far greater number than Hitler ever had of the submarines of 15 years ago. Modern skills and modern science have been used by the Communists to make their submarine fleet far more powerful than that of Hitler, and it would be folly to imagine that increasing oil imports from the Old World could continue to flow into the refineries of the United States if a third world war were launched.

We dare not run the risk of closing down a substantial part of our coal and petroleum sources of supply as we have been doing while no one in the Government can venture to predict what the result of the Soviet challenge respecting West Berlin will be.

WE HAVE TREMENDOUS RESERVES OF OIL AND COAL

The studies of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs have indicated that the reserves of coal of all kinds within the boundaries of the United States amount to almost 2½ trillion short tons.

In the public land States more than one-third of the entire acreage of the United States is held by the Government and is subject to mineral leases, including leases for petroleum and coal. In seven Eastern States the Government has acquired a large area of oil and gas lands. Some 45 million acres of public land in Alaska is under oil and gas lease to the Government, and no one can predict how much more oil is to be found there. All in all, the Secretary of the Interior has at least 100 million acres of public land under oil and gas lease. Other substantial areas are under lease by the State of Texas. The Interior Department administers the as yet unexplored tidelands of the United States and, according to the Bureau of Land Management, approximately 500,000 acres of coal are under lease or permit in the public land States.

Not only is this true of the public land States, but in other States, such as Pennsylvania, there are great deposits of both oil and coal.

The same conditions which I have described as existing in the West exist there. The State of West Virginia has huge deposits of coal, production of which has practically ceased. Not only is there great unemployment there, but in many areas of that State the people actually lack food, because we have not stimulated the development of our coal industry when we have the need, the know-how, the skill, and the opportunity.

Liquid fuel can be made from coal. The senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], then a Member of the House, and I were sponsors of legislation several years ago authorizing the Bureau of Mines to establish test plants to produce liquid fuel from coal and from oil shale. That experimentation has been stopped. It is my belief that it is needed again.

EXPLORATION AND PRODUCTION MUST BE STIMULATED

These tremendous areas and their underlying deposits are our sole certain source of energy supply if war comes.

It is essential, therefore, since the Interior Department, through its Bureau of Land Management, its Bureau of Mines, its Geological Survey, and the laws of Congress, has jurisdiction over these unexplored areas rich in natural resources and, since we are involved in an economic war and threatened by a shooting war which can shut us off from all foreign supplies, that we should now take immediate steps to make certain that the exploration and development of all of our areas capable of producing these domestic minerals is vigorously stimulated.

The bill which I have introduced could properly be referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, because the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs is the committee which, under the rules of the Senate, has been given jurisdiction over the problems involved in stimulating the production of petroleum and developing our mineral resources.

If war comes it will come by the submarine and it will come by the intercontinental ballistic missile. Only last month the Secretary of Defense, Neil H. McElroy, testified before Senate committees that the Department of Defense is not now planning to match the Communists missile for missile but will continue to maintain superiority with missiles of minor range and the Strategic Air Command of which we have been justly proud. In other words, it is acknowledged that we no longer have complete military superiority. We must, therefore, expand our own domestic sources of petroleum and coal and prevent them at the same time from being inundated by foreign supplies of petroleum which could so easily be cut off.

OUR RESOURCES MUST BE PROTECTED BY LEGISLATIVE ACTION

The United States has the resources of petroleum and coal. It must have the will to protect them, and it must no longer depend on voluntary Executive order control or Executive mandatory controls which will be the subject of litigation in the courts once the attempt is made to establish them.

This I say on the authority of the statements which have been filed with the Government at the request of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense. They have been filed by some of the large integrated oil companies, and from the statements it is clear that they wish to place no limitation upon any importation. If this is carried out, then it becomes clear that it is of vital importance to the people of the United States that we develop our own domestic deposits of these vital minerals.

A bill to encourage the development of petroleum and coal reserves within the United States

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Domestic Petroleum and Coal Development Act of 1959."

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. The continued exploration for and development of domestic petroleum reserves within the United States is essential to meet the domestic demand for crude petroleum and petroleum products so that the people of the United States may not become completely dependent upon the importation of such crude petroleum and petroleum products. To attain this objective it is necessary to maintain a reasonable balance between domestic production and the importation of such crude petroleum and petroleum products. The desirable ratio of such imports to total domestic demand is that which assures a vigorous level of domestic petroleum exploration and development. The importation of crude petroleum and petroleum products, including residual fuel in any form, should be restricted to the level at which that ratio is maintained. In administering such restrictions, quotas should be granted, with certain exceptions provided for in section 7 of this Act, only to refining companies in proportion to plant capacity.

OIL IMPORTS ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") shall administer the provisions of this Act through an "Oil Imports Administration" (hereinafter referred to as the "Administration") which the Secretary shall establish as a separate agency within the Department of the Interior. The Secretary may appoint, without regard to the civil service laws, an Administrator of such Administration, who shall report directly to the Secretary and shall be compensated at the rate provided by law for Assistant Secretaries of the executive departments. The Secretary may also appoint a Deputy Administrator of the Administration and directors of the principal organizational divisions of the Administration, without regard to the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1949. To the maximum extent possible the Secretary shall, in carrying out the provisions of this Act obtain and utilize the data and cooperation of existing Government agencies within and outside the Department of the Interior.

QUOTA PERIODS

SEC. 4. The Secretary shall establish quota periods of six months duration, during which quotas established under this Act shall be effective, based upon the seasonal demands of the petroleum industry. The first quota period established after the effective date of this section may be a period of less than six months.

DETERMINATION OF NATIONAL IMPORT LEVELS

SEC. 5. Not less than sixty days prior to each quota period, the Secretary shall estimate and publish in the Federal Register the total domestic demand for crude petroleum and petroleum products and the portion thereof which may be imported consistently with the maintenance of a vigorous level of domestic petroleum exploration and development. The Secretary shall at the same time publish in the Federal Register the amount of imports so determined, in terms of barrels per day of crude petroleum and the crude petroleum equivalent of petroleum products, which shall be the national imports level for the ensuing quota period.

ALLOCATION OF QUOTAS

SEC. 6. Except as provided in section 7, quotas shall be allocated only to domestic refiners who shall make application not less than ninety days before each quota period. Not less than sixty days prior to each quota period the Secretary shall determine, announce, and publish in the Federal Register the import quotas for all applicant refiners. Such quotas shall be divided among refiners in such manner as to maintain competitive conditions between integrated and independent companies and the allocation to coastal refineries shall not be in excess of 40 per centum of the total import: Provided, That in the case of any refining plant served by pipeline from foreign sources or where conditions otherwise limit the procurement of domestic crude petroleum by ordinary practical means, a quota sufficient for that plant's crude petroleum requirements to maintain refining capacity shall be issued. The uniform quota percentage determined by the Secretary shall be that percentage which, applied to the aggregate capacity of all refining plants in the United States owners of which shall have applied for quotas, together with any additional amounts authorized as a result of the provision in the last preceding sentence and any special quotas authorized in section 7, will not exceed the national import level set for the following quota period. The Secretary shall issue quota certificates evidencing all quotas (including special quotas) issued under the provisions of this Act.

ALLOCATION OF SPECIAL QUOTAS

SEC. 7. Upon application and after hearing, special quotas may be awarded, in accordance with standards which shall be established by the Secretary and published in the Federal Register, in the following cases:

(1) Where a domestic producer operating abroad demonstrates that, despite all reasonable efforts by him, he is suffering as a result of import quotas in such foreign operations unreasonble drainage by others who have joint or offsetting interests in the same petroleum pool.

(2) Where an applicant desires to import special crude petroleums for special purposes and accordingly the importation thereof will not substantially replace domestic crude petroleum and will not therefore affect the national security.

(3) Where the applicant exports petroleum products refined by him and seeks a special quota to cover the crude equivalent of such products which will not compete in the domestic market.

(4) In cases where the applicant is an inland refinery and is suffering hardship by reason of inadequate access to the points of importation.

NONTRANSFERABILITY OF QUOTAS

SEC. 8. A quota may be used only for the importation of crude petroleum or petroleum products by the person to whom such quota was granted, and in the case of a quota for crude petroleum, the crude petroleum must be used in the plant for which the quota is granted unless, after application to the Secretary by the holder of the quota and after public hearing, the Secretary finds that the public interest and the purposes of this Act will be served by a transfer.

PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

SEC. 9. Quotas awarded under this Act shall cover both crude petroleum and petroleum products, including residual fuel. Such quotas shall be in terms of barrels per day of crude petroleum. Product importations shall be charged against such quotas according to their crude petroleum equivalent as determined and announced from time to time by the Secretary, and in the case of residual fuel the total imports in any calendar quarter of any year shall not exceed 10 per centum of the total domestic petroleum demand as determined by the Secretary when he determines the levels of national imports as provided in section 5 hereof.

FINALITY OF DETERMINATIONS

SEC. 10. The facts constituting the basis for any national import level or quota or denial thereof under the provisions of this Act, determined in conformity with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary, shall be reviewable only by the Secretary, and his determinations with respect thereto shall be final and conclusive.

APPEALS

SEC. 11. (a) An appeal may be taken, in the manner hereinafter provided, to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in any of the following cases:

(1) By any applicant for a quota whose application is denied.

(2) By any person aggrieved by reason of any decision of the Secretary granting or revising any quota.

(b) Such appeal shall be taken by filing with said court, within twenty days after the decision complained of is effective, notice in writing of said appeal and a statement of the reasons therefore, together with proof of service of a true copy of said notice and statement upon the Secretary. Unless a later date is specified by the Secretary as part of his decision, the decision complained of shall be considered to be effective as of the date on which public announcement of the decision is made at the office of the Secretary in the city of Washington. The Secretary shall thereupon, and in any event not later than ten days from the date of such service upon him, mail or otherwise deliver a copy of said notice of appeal to each person shown by the records of the Secretary to be interested in such appeal and to have a right to intervene therein under the provisions of this section, and shall at all times thereafter permit any such person to inspect and make copies of appellants' reasons for said appeal at the office of the Secretary in the city of Washington. Within thirty days after the filing of such appeal the Secretary shall file with the court the record upon which the decision complained of was entered, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code, and a list of all interested persons to whom he has delivered a copy of said notice of appeal.

(c) Within thirty days after the filing of such appeal any interested person may intervene and participate in the proceedings had upon such appeal by filing with the court a notice of intention to intervene and a verified statement showing the nature of the interest of such party together with proof of service of true copies of said notice and statement, both upon the appellant and upon the Secretary. Any person who would be aggrieved or whose interests would be adversely affected by reversal or modification of the decision of the Secretary complained of shall be considered an interested party.

(d) At the earliest convenient time the court shall hear and determine the appeal upon the record before it, and shall have power, upon such record, to enter a judgment affirming or reversing the decision, and if it enters an order reversing the decision of the Secretary it shall remand the case to the Secretary to carry out the judgment of the court. Review by the court under the provisions of this section shall be limited to questions of law, and the findings of fact by the Secretary, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive unless it shall clearly appear that the findings of the Secretary are arbitrary or capricious. The court's judgment shall be final, subject, however, to review by the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of certiorari on petition therefor, under section 1254 of title 28 of the United States Code, by appellant, by the Secretary, or by any interested party intervening in the appeal.

(e) The court may, in its discretion, enter judgment for costs in favor of or against an appellant, and other interested parties intervening in said appeal, but not against the Secretary, depending upon the nature of the issues involved in such appeal and the outcome thereof.

REGULATIONS AND PUBLICATION OF DETERMINATIONS

SEC. 12. (a) The Secretary may establish such rules and regulations, which shall have the force and effect of law, as may be necessary to carry out the purposes and provisions of this Act. Any person knowingly violating any rule or regulation of the Secretary issued pursuant to this Act shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $100 for each such violation.

(b) All quotas established under the provisions of this Act shall be promptly published in the Federal Register and shall be accompanied by a statement of the basis and considerations upon which each such determination was made.

ACTION IN EMERGENCIES

SEC. 13. Whenever the President finds that a national economic or other emergency exists with respect to petroleum, he shall, by message to Congress, recommend such legislation to suspend the operation of or to amend this Act as he deems necessary in the public interest.

IMPORTATION IN EXCESS OF QUOTA PROHIBITED

SEC. 14. The importation of crude petroleum or petroleum products in excess of the quotas provided under the authority of this act is hereby prohibited. No importation of crude petroleum or petroleum products as defined herein unless exempted under section 10 hereof shall be cleared through customs unless a currently valid quota certificate issued under the provisions of this Act is filed with and as a supplement to the customs declaration.

ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

SEC. 15. In the administration of this Act the Secretary shall have the authority vested in the President under the provisions of subsections (b), (c), and (d) of section 710 of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. sec. 2160 (b), (c), and (d)).

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 16. As used in this Act—

(1) The term "United States" includes the several States, the District of Columbia, the Territory of Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

(2) The term "petroleum" includes all forms of petroleum except those forms which are gaseous at normal temperature and atmospheric pressure.

(3) The term "crude petroleum" means petroleum at the wellhead.

(4) The term "petroleum products" includes all conversions and derivatives of petroleum.

(5) The term "refining capacity" means the demonstrable maximum efficient daily average crude throughput of a plant in complete operation, using the crude stream proposed for the quota period involved, with allowance for necesasry shutdown time for routine maintenance, repairs, and other such matters.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 17. Sections 3 and 16 of this Act shall become effective on the date of enactment of this Act. The remainder of this Act shall become effective after 90 days following the date of enactment of this Act.

AMENDMENT OF LABOR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, TO PROVIDE EFFECTIVE METHOD OF DEALING WITH CERTAIN LABOR DISPUTES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, so as to provide a more effective method of dealing with labor disputes in vital industries which affect the national security. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by the Senator from Oregon in explanation of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1160) to amend the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, so as to provide a more effective method of dealing with labor disputes in vital industries which affect the national security, introduced by Mr. PROXMIRE (for Mr. MORSE), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The statement of Mr. MORSE, presented by Mr. PROXMIRE, is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MORSE

I have introduced a bill designed to provide needed machinery to aid in the settlement of labor-management disputes that threaten the national welfare.

In 1949, when a labor dispute—a shipping strike—was raging in Hawaii, I said in the Senate, and I quote, that: "under the Taft-Hartley law we have the most ineffective procedure in this respect that I think can be provided * * * The American people are still being led to believe in the myth that the emergency disputes section of the Taft-Hartley law has done some good. As a matter of fact, it has done inestimable harm. It has caused great delay and it has failed to settle cases."

The truth of that estimate was proved again in 1950. That year I first introduced the measure I am introducing today, at least in substance, when a crisis in the coal industry was about to be "solved" by seizure of the mines.

Two years ago I again introduced it when a longshoremen's strike on the east coast threatened to paralyze shipping, and the health and welfare of a great metropolitan area.

It is also virtually the same proposal that was recommended for passage by the Senate Labor Committee in 1952.

Our committee study at that time indicated that the inflexible injunction provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act afford little help in furthering settlement once the injunction has been issued and has expired. That is what happened in the case of the longshoremen's strike of 1957. After the expiration of the injunction, the community is once again faced with the possibility of a crippling strike.

This proposed legislation is aimed at keeping the parties bargaining; it provides a continuing procedure under which the President and Congress keep surveillance of emergency disputes; both executive seizure and injunctions are permissible under my bill, with a congressional veto on such action.

These and its other provisions are designed to put the premium upon continued bargaining between the disputing parties.

Now is the time, in my opinion, to rewrite the totally inadequate emergency disputes section of the Taft-Hartley Act. We should do it now, when no emergency threatens, and the problem can be considered dispassionately.

A blue-ribbon committee of private citizens, all experts in labor relations, has just been selected by the Senate Labor Committee to conduct a complete study and review of the Taft-Hartley Act. I want this statement in the RECORD, and my bill, available to that advisory panel. It is my hope that it will give careful thought and study to this entire subject.

If it can propose something better than my bill, I shall be delighted; but I hope that at least it will cover this area in its deliberations.

BILLS FOR ADVANCEMENT OF MEDICAL RESEARCH IN GENERAL AND CANCER RESEARCH IN PARTICULAR

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I introduce two simple legislative proposals designed to aid in solving one of the most complex and terrible riddles of our time—the mystery of cancer.

My first measure would provide $500 million for cancer research under the direction of the National Cancer Institute, this sum to remain available until expended.

The second bill would amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958 to permit forgiveness of up to 50 percent of loans granted under the program to persons who enter medical research.

Mr. President, my first suggestion is not new. I introduced a similar measure on May 2, 1957. Since that time close to a million persons in the United States have been stricken with cancer, and nearly half a million have died of the disease. Forty million Americans now living will contract cancer and the disease will reach into two out of three homes in our country. Unless new treatments and cures are found 26 million of us will die of cancer. Despite research advances, the threat of cancer remains ominous and omnipresent.

The figure of $500 million is not one plucked from the air. In 1956, I was told by Dr. Leonard A. Scheele, former Surgeon General of the United States, who was then my neighbor in the Georgetown section of Washington, D.C., that the National Cancer Institute might use as much as this amount if the availability of such funds was known well in advance and if extensive preparations might be made for the employment of skilled scientists and medical researchers.

I resubmit this proposal to Congress today with a sense of urgency heightened by my own recent operation for cancer and knowledge of the terrible toll of human suffering reaped by this disease which I have gained during the past two years from visits to cancer clinics, interviews with cancer specialists, and study of the hundreds of letters from cancer victims and their families which have crossed my Senate office desk.

Cancer is the second leading cause of death in the United States today. It cuts across all age groups. More children die of cancer than of any other single cause except accidents. While 579 American children died of polio in the last year before the development of the Salk vaccine, more than six times this number succumbed to cancer—3,761.

ALL RESEARCH WILL BENEFIT

Incidence and mortality rates are guideposts in the allocation of resources for research on particular diseases. That disease which cripples and kills the greatest number across the widest age span can be said to deserve the greatest effort. But there is no effective way to measure human suffering, to rank the pain caused victim, family and friends by one disease as against that caused by another. I present this suggestion today in the belief that it provides an opportunity to exhibit the effect which removal of inhibiting financial restrictions can have on all medical research. I am confident that the results will benefit our general fight against disease.

My proposal follows principles which must guide all effective medical research. This measure would:

First. Insure continuity and stability in cancer research. Able investigators of the malignancy would be assured that their salaries were no longer reliant on the uncertainties of year-to-year congressional appropriations and thus there could be avoided the inevitable temptation to these people to abandon their research and laboratories for the greater financial rewards of private medical practice. Projects initiated would not have to be canceled for the reason of a lack of funds. Long-range studies could be planned and implemented. All promising leads could be explored.

Second. Permit expansion of basic as well as applied research. Great forward steps in medicine have resulted from fundamental studies originally deemed only distantly related to patient treatment. Expansion of available funds would allow a broader scope for cancer research.

Third. Recognize that medical research cannot move forward by an arbitrary schedule but free researchers from financial limitations which cramp the ingenuity of the mind.

I emphasize the importance of basic research. While basic research is not the sole objective of the bills, it is important to realize the value of basic research. Several years ago a member of the President's Cabinet said he did not see any reason to spend Government funds to find out why grass was green and fried potatoes were brown. But if a great Austrian monk had not learned why certain flowers growing in his garden had different colors, mankind might have been delayed for centuries in understanding the miracle of heredity.

CREATIVITY LIMITS UNKNOWN

Some have said that the fight against disease is restricted by the limits of human creativity. This is a truism; man cannot understand cancer faster than he can understand cancer. We shall never know the limits of human creativity in the field of cancer research until we supply sufficient funds to enable medical science to test its utmost powers—run the last test, analyze the final chemical, examine the terminal slide.

The Manhattan project which led to the atomic bomb compressed decades of research into a few short years. The Nation was at war and the sense of urgency was great. Yet can any war compare in importance with the war against cancer? Almost two and one-half times as many Americans died of cancer during World War II as were killed in action on all our worldwide battlefronts. In 1 year cancer claimed nearly 10 times the number of Americans who perished in 3 years of fighting in Korea.

In fiscal year 1956 congressional appropriations for the National Cancer Institute were $24,978,000. In fiscal year 1957 the sum was $48,432,000—nearly double the previous fiscal period. For the current fiscal year Congress appropriated $75,268,000—triple the amount provided only 4 years before. These appropriations were approved by the Congress in the belief that they would significantly advance man's knowledge of cancer. They have. As a direct result of these moneys has come new understanding of possible cancer-inducing viruses, hormones, chemicals and bacteria, advances in treatment through chemotherapy, radiation, and surgery. These gains show the ability of science to put to effective use all resources made available. They represent not an end, but a challenge—proof that the frontiers of men's minds have not yet been reached.

ECONOMIC LOSS GREAT

Mr. President, dollar and cents figures are inadequate to describe the agony of cancer. Yet they reveal the economic loss which the Nation suffers annually because of this disease. It is estimated that in 1957, 570,000 new cases of cancer were diagnosed, resulting in a cost of 3½ million man-years of work and $14 million in lost goods and services. In 1956 alone, cancer disabilities cost 113,000 man-years lost in industry, $454,373,000 in lost earnings, and $55,709,000 in income tax revenue lost to the Federal Government.

Today we are spending $6.8 billion annually for weapons, missile and armaments research by the armed services, $6.1 billion on tobacco, $1.09 billion on jewelry, but less than $111 million on cancer research. The supercarrier Forrestal cost $204 million—nearly twice the total sum available for the fight against cancer.

Of the relatively meager sum available for cancer, $75 million—or nearly 70 percent—represents funds through the National Cancer Institute. If expenditures for cancer research are to reach a level commensurate with need, it is obvious that the Federal Government must lead the way.

Yet, despite this fact, the Eisenhower administration has budgeted less for cancer research in fiscal year 1960 than was provided by Congress for the current fiscal year.

Mr. President, during my short span of service in the United States Senate, I have seen appropriations for cancer research rise from $21,737,000 in the fiscal year 1955 to $75,268,000 in the current fiscal year. I have been proud to assist in obtaining these increases under the tutelage and guidance of the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senate leader in this endeavor. I hope that when his appropriations subcommittee considers funds for the National Institutes of Health later this year he will wish to give the proposal I offer today careful study, and that he will find it of merit.

UNITED STATES OPPORTUNITY UNIQUE

Congress has a great opportunity for service here, not only to the Nation but to the world. An all-out effort by the United States to remove the haunting threat of cancer would demonstrate to all nations the desire of our country to devote its rich resources to the betterment of mankind. With its wealth of talent and technology the United States has a responsibility which it cannot shirk.

Mr. President, progress in medical research is dependent upon availability of adequate funds for buildings, equipment, and personnel. But provision of necessary moneys is a sterile step if trained minds to utilize them are not present. Research and education are inseparable twins. Therefore, I suggest that Congress amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958, so as to provide for medical and science students the same incentive factor now existing for prospective elementary and secondary teachers under this law.

The authoritative Bayne-Jones report indicates that if there occurs an expansion of total national medical research expenditures to $900 million by 1970, there will be a need for 25,000 new medical researchers. Projection of current statistics shows that the supply of physicians and doctorates in science will fall short of this goal by 6,000. Long-range corrective measures are required if we are to meet even these minimum objectives—which are based on the assumption that the proportion of all research and development expenditures represented by medical research will remain constant at the average for the past decade. Federal assistance in the construction of new medical schools and Government aid for operating these and present schools will be necessary.

NEED IS IMMEDIATE

But the effect of these programs would not be felt for many years. Need is immediate. Both the total supply of doctors and scientists and the rate of entrance into research must be increased if we are to accelerate medical research.

A major block to achievement of these goals is the high cost of medical education. Leonard Engel, noted writer on medical and scientific subjects, reported recently in the New York Times:

> Tuition charges of $800 a year are not uncommon among private medical schools today, and one State school charges nonresidents $2,500 a year. Counting living expenses and the like, a medical degree now requires a 4-year outlay by the student and his family of about $14,000 or $3,500 a year. And to this must be added a further outlay during his 2 years of internship, when he is customarily rewarded with room, board, and a pittance of about $75 a month. The high cost of acquiring a medical degree is narrowing the population base from which future doctors are drawn.

Financial obstacles undoubtedly discourage many young men and women from attempting to enter upon the long training required to produce a qualified physician. Yet these persons might well possess the innate talent and intelligence which, when cultivated and channeled by the exacting discipline of medical science, might mean a significant contribution to the advance of man's knowledge of the human body.

Many students who have completed their undergraduate work, finished medical school, and served their internship and residency, find their economic position so precarious that they feel forced to employ their learned skills in private practice, where monetary rewards are, of course, greatest.

TUITION COSTS UP

Medical school tuition has risen 85 percent since 1940. Many medical students must borrow, in order to complete their education. A recent survey covering more than 6,000 medical students showed that one-third expect to be in debt when they graduate from medical school.

Mr. President, the National Defense Education Act of 1958 offers a mechanism through which Congress can assist in supplying the trained medical researchers we need.

Under the student loan program authorized by title II of the act, the Federal Government contributes $9 to each $1 supplied by colleges and universities for loans to needy and deserving students. Students may borrow up to $1,000 per year, and a maximum of $5,000. Special consideration is given to students with superior academic backgrounds who intend to teach in elementary or secondary schools, or to those whose academic backgrounds indicate superior capacity or preparation in science, mathematics, engineering, or a modern foreign language.

Both basic science and medical students are eligible for these loans, according to the liberal interpretation of the law by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. In the first allocation of these funds by the Department, 15 institutions devoted to the teaching of the healing arts received funds directly. In numerous other cases, medical schools affiliated with a university or college will obtain such moneys through allocations made by the parent institution.

Each institution receiving funds will handle its own student loan program and will select the individuals who will be granted loans to continue their education. Local administration will, of course, determine the extent to which medical students and basic science students intent upon a career in medical research will benefit.

EXTEND FORGIVENESS FEATURE

Title II of the existing act provides that 50 percent of each student loan will be canceled for 5 years of full-time teaching in a public elementary or secondary school, at the rate of 10 percent for each year of such service.

Mr. President, I propose that Congress extend to those who enter medical research the same loan repayment advantage now enjoyed by persons who become elementary and secondary teachers.

The amendment which I propose today would allow cancellation of not to exceed 50 percent of a loan, plus interest, granted under title II of the National Defense Education Act for full-time service in medical research in a Federal, public, or nonprofit institution at the rate of 10 percent of the amount of the loan, plus interest which was unpaid on the first day of such service for each full year of such service. In other words, Mr. President, for each full year that the graduate will spend in the realm of medical research, he or she will have 10 percent of the loan from the Federal Government forgiven; and this particular benefaction can extend up to 50 percent of the total loan.

In recognition of the fact that a medical student's training and period of depressed earning power does not end with graduation from medical school, but continues through internship and residency, my amendment further provides that interest shall not accrue and periodic installments need not be paid during a period, not in excess of 5 years, during which the borrower is serving in a hospital as a medical intern or as a resident physician.

SIGNIFICANT VALUES OBTAINABLE

Mr. President, I do not pretend that this proposal is a panacea. It does not reach the vital problem of inadequate medical school operating funds and facilities. Unfortunately, neither did the National Defense Education Act of 1958 solve our classroom shortage or aid in gaining decent salaries for teachers. However, my amendment provides significant values.

First, it will create a stimulatory impact on those desiring a career in medical research, or on persons already embarked upon training leading to such a vocation, but inhibited by lack of funds.

Second, its effect will be immediate. Knowledge that such financial support is available will be a factor weighed by those now debating the decision as to the career they will follow. In some cases, it will be a deciding factor in favor of medical research.

Third, it is a program which can be easily implemented through the administration of existing law.

If this plan is to be successful, Congress must provide necessary appropriations to allow full implementation of the loan program. Funds now available are inadequate for carrying out the purposes of the existing provisions of the National Defense Education Act. In the first distribution of grants under title II, 1,227 institutions submitted requests totaling $62 million. Appropriations permitted the allocation of only $6 million—an utterly inadequate sum in the face of demonstrated demand.

DECREASE HUMAN SUFFERING

Mr. President, the preamble to the National Defense Education Act of 1958 states that:

The defense of this Nation depends upon the mastery of modern techniques developed from complex scientific principles. It depends as well upon the discovery and development of new principles, new techniques, and new knowledge.

The case for expansion of medical research will stand on its own merits; it means the decrease of untold human suffering. But true national defense requires the maximum conservation of our human resources. In this sense, there could be no more significant modification of the National Defense Education Act of 1958.

Mr. President, in the Sunday New York Times of February 22, 1959, there appeared an article entitled "Cancer, Dulles, and Hope," written by the distinguished Dr. Howard A. Rusk, medical editor of that newspaper and one of the great medical writers of our time. Dr. Rusk noted the dismay felt round the world at the news of Mr. Dulles' cancer recurrence, discussed the treatments available to the Secretary of State, and pointed to the vital need for international cooperation to support an all-out effort against disease.

TOMORROW—OR THE FUTURE?

This week hearings will be held on the Health for Peace bill, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], which would establish the domestic machinery for implementing such a worldwide program. I am happy to be a cosponsor of this measure. I am confident that Congress will give it speedy approval.

Mr. President, I should like to read two paragraphs from Dr. Rusk's very able article, which vividly summarize the need for a vast expansion of cancer research. Dr. Rusk wrote:

Today, Secretary of State Dulles fights against time for his life. When will the scientific breakthrough come to solve the riddle of cancer? Tomorrow, or in the indefinite future?

No one knows. What we do know, however, is that the more scientists who are at work on the problem in laboratories all over the world, the greater are the odds for solution and the quicker that solution will come.

This, Mr. President, is one of the reasons why I make these proposals today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the New York Times article by Dr. Rusk, together with the text of the two bills which I have sent to the desk for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills and article will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. NEUBERGER, were received, read twice by their titles, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Appropriations:

"S. 1162

"A bill making an additional appropriation for the National Cancer Institute, Public Health Service, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sum is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to provide an additional appropriation for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, namely:

"DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

"Public Health Service

"National Cancer Institute: For an additional amount to enable the Surgeon General, upon the recommendations of the National Advisory Cancer Council, to make grants-in-aid for research and training projects relating to cancer; to cooperate with State health agencies, and other public and private nonprofit institutions, in the prevention, control, and eradication of cancer by providing consultative services, demonstrations, and grants-in-aid; and to contract on a cost or other basis for supplies and services by negotiation, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, in connection with the chemotherapy program, including indemnification of contractors to the extent and subject to the limitations provided in title 10, United States Code, section 2354, except that approval and certification required thereby shall be by the Surgeon General; and to otherwise carry out the provisions of title IV, part A, of the Public Health Service Act; $500,000,000 to remain available until expended."

To the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"A bill to amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958 in order to promote the medical sciences, and for other purposes

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 205(b)(2) of the National Defense Education Act of 1958 is amended by striking out 'or' before '(ii)', and by inserting after 'Armed Forces of the United States,' the following: 'or (iii) not in excess of 5 years, during which the borrower is serving in a hospital in a State as a medical intern or as a resident physician,'.

"SEC. 2. Section 205(b)(3) of such Act is amended by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof a comma and the following: 'or for full-time service in medical research in a Federal, public, or nonprofit institution in a State at the rate of 10 per centum of the amount of such loan plus interest thereon which was unpaid on the first day of such service, for each full year of such service.' "

The article presented by Mr. NEUBERGER is as follows:

CANCER, DULLES, AND HOPE—A REPORT ON THE TREATMENTS AVAILABLE AND HOW RESEARCH CAN DEVELOP MORE

(By Howard A. Rusk, M.D.)

People around the world were shocked and grieved last week to learn that Secretary of State John Foster Dulles has a recurrence of gastro-intestinal cancer.

Immediately after it was reported that tissue and fluid had been removed during an operation for simple hernia repair, those experienced in cancer suspected this. Such a procedure is never done unless pathology is found in the underlying tissues. Cancer specialists were at once aware from the reports that the cancer cells in the abdominal fluid meant a general spread of the malignancy with a grave prognosis.

Cancer, which took the lives of 250,000 Americans in 1958, has been the second leading cause of death in the United States since 1938. Mortality from certain types of cancer, notably leukemia and cancer of the respiratory system has steadily increased in the last 25 years.

During this time, death from cancer of the digestive system, such as that affecting Secretary Dulles, has declined. This decline has resulted from the great advances made in surgery, the most effective weapon in the war against cancer.

ADVANCES CITED

Technical advances combined with early diagnosis have permitted removal of tumors heretofore believed inoperable.

Five-year survival rates for patients with carcinoma of the stomach have increased almost 50 percent for patients with localized lesions, and to about 20 percent for patients with advanced disease.

Even so, the results of treating gastro-intestinal malignancy leave much to be desired. Cancer of the digestive system, which caused half of the cancer deaths in 1930, caused only 1 out of 3 such deaths in 1958. Even with this decline, this type of cancer still kills more people than any other.

Large-scale research is currently being conducted in cancer chemotherapy and a number of drugs have been found that cause temporary regressions in some types of cancer.

In almost all instances, however, these drugs are of only temporary value and none have significant value in cancer of the digestive tract. Nor can the encouraging results that have been obtained with radioactive isotopes and sex hormones be regarded as cures as yet.

TWO EFFECTIVE CURES

Currently there are only two known effective ways of curing cancer—surgery and radiation. Surgery seeks to effect the cure through the removal of all diseased tissue.

Treatment by X-ray and radium is based on the fact that radiant energy is more damaging to cancer cells than to normal cells. X-rays, when effective, act promptly, but are most efficient when brought into direct contact with radiosensitive types of cancer.

Gastrointestinal cancer is not usually one of the types that is sensitive to X-ray therapy. For the time being, at least, however, Secretary Dulles' physicians have decided this is the treatment of choice, and the Secretary is to have one radiation treatment daily from a million-volt X-ray machine.

This week, while the Nation and people around the world hope and pray for the recovery of our tireless, dedicated Secretary of State, public hearings will be held by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on the International Health and Medical Research Act of 1959.

This proposed legislation, known popularly as the health-for-peace bill, would increase support of an allout international effort in the war against cancer, heart disease, and the other scourges of mankind.

FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS SOUGHT

The bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator LISTER HILL, Democrat, of Alabama, with 59 cosponsors, and in the House of Representatives by Representative JOHN E. FOGARTY, Democrat, of Rhode Island. It is an outgrowth of the proposals made by President Eisenhower in his state of the Union message in 1958. It would authorize an annual appropriation of $50 million for this international research effort.

Authorities in cancer research report that today there are many scientists throughout the world whose skills and experience are being fully utilized in cancer research. This bill would help mobilize these research specialists in an allout global attack.

Today Secretary Dulles fights against time for his life. When will the scientific breakthrough come to solve the riddle of cancer? Tomorrow or in the indefinite future?

No one knows. What we do know, however, is that the more scientists who are at work on the problem in laboratories all over the world the greater are the odds for solution and the quicker that solution will come.

What greater evidence of appreciation to Secretary Dulles for his dedicated service to our country and world peace could the Nation give than to add to its national effort against cancer an international attack? Cancer sufferers throughout the world would be given new hope in the realization that an international army of scientists was fighting for them. For some or for many victory might come in time.

ELEVENTH ANNUAL ARTHUR FLEMMING AWARDS LUNCHEON

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on February 19 I was privileged to address the 11th annual Arthur Flemming awards luncheon, in downtown Washington, honoring 10 outstanding young men in the Federal Government, 5 chosen from the scientific or technical fields, and 5 from the administrative and executive fields.

The occasion was intensely interesting to anyone who, like myself, shares a deep interest in the morale and efficiency of the Federal civil service.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD my address to the luncheon group of February 19; second, the 10 citations given to the 10 selected outstanding young men; next, the names of the judges who made the selections; and last, the program of the ceremony.

I hope our colleagues will at least look at the program and see what a remarkable job was performed by the Junior Chamber of Commerce of Washington, D.C.

There being no objection, the address, citations, list, and program, were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR HUMPHREY AT ARTHUR S. FLEMMING AWARDS LUNCHEON FEBRUARY 19, 1959

The Arthur S. Flemming award is appropriate recognition of one who has done much to increase public understanding of the role and stature of the public servant. It is an honor—a significant honor for these men to receive the award, and a rare privilege for those of us who participate in the award ceremony.

Recognition of this kind is a real incentive. It is encouraging. It is the kind of thing that makes a person feel good about the work he has been doing and the job he is in. I know the 10 honored here today are sincerely pleased and delighted and encouraged.

We are much indebted to the Jaycees and their awards cosponsor, the American Security & Trust Co. for this kind of recognition of excellence in Government.

How we keep the tone of Government high—the operation sharp and clean—is a matter of vital importance today. It demands, for one thing, that we must constantly search for new kinds of incentives and encouragement for the young people coming up.

One obvious incentive, and the incentive which has been traditional with private enterprise, has been the larger paycheck. Topflight young men and women in industry are drawing down very substantial salaries indeed. They get salaries which—let us be frank—Government cannot hope to match. Even though Government offers a liberal pension program and a good leave system, it cannot expect to approach the direct financial rewards of private industry.

Nevertheless, we should try to at least partly keep the gap closed between Government and private industry.

For example, I strongly support the President's request that the statutory limitation on the number of supergrades in the civil service system be broadened, in fact, largely left to the discretion of the Civil Service Commission.

By and large, of course, promising young men and women enter Government—and stay—for reasons which are more important than the pay they will earn. Necessarily they make their choice to take less pay than they can expect to draw outside in exchange for other considerations.

One overwhelming consideration in their choice, I am convinced, is the opportunity to serve. This is a genuine, rock-solid motivation. And the Nation has good reason to be grateful that so many fine young men and women truly feel the call to public service.

But no one is immune to discouragement and frustration. And it is too often true that promising young people in both industry and Government lose heart when they fail to find an outlet for their creative energies—when they feel themselves held down by redtape and severe budget limitations.

And it is also a little disheartening when a man has accomplished something worthwhile to have it go unnoticed and unmarked. All of us appreciate a pat on the back—a little encouragement goes a long way.

We have taken a step in the right direction with the enactment of the Employee Incentive Award system—which permits a Government employee's supervisors and agency the chance to give some tangible recognition for his achievements in contribution to the improved efficiency and economy of the service.

For the first time, under this act, we took steps to give a spot award to a Government employee at about the time he has earned it. However, I believe that our restrictions on this program have been too tight—both in the amounts of the awards and in their frequency. We ought to be more generous and more liberal with the relatively small amounts involved, for it is clear that a modest investment in the incentive award system has encouraged a measurably greater efficiency and economy in Government. It's a good investment.

Another tremendously successful incentive has been the recently authorized off-the-job training program for outstanding employees. This is a highly significant departure from traditional Government procedures, and marks the beginning of what I hope will become a flourishing undertaking.

I would not be surprised if some of the men being honored here today were to take part in the new training program.

Certainly it is made to order for them.

There are other things we could do to encourage top performance. Why could we not, for instance, seriously consider expanding the off-the-job training program to arrange, for exceptionally meritorious career employees now and then, a sabbatical leave, not only to study at a university, but to travel and to hide out somewhere to read and think and to generate new ideas?

One excellent way of providing this opportunity might be with the use of counterpart funds secured through the operation of Public Law 480, from the sale of surplus food and fiber from the Commodity Credit Corporation stocks. Such funds, which are already in the hands of our Government, would provide at no expense to the American taxpayer, the opportunity for outstanding men in our civil service to travel and study with their counterparts in foreign governments, for in-service training in some cases, and for the training of civil servants in those governments which have far to go in bringing their administrative and technical services up to an efficient standard.

Our Government services both at home and abroad are part of our total defense structure. In fact, one of the great strengths of this Nation is the very high quality of our civil servants. One of the highest priority projects, in fact, which we should undertake when we are considering assistance to the new nations of Asia and Africa, is assistance in upgrading and improving the administrative structures of government.

Another idea that might be explored is based on the concept that, once a young person has reached a plateau of earnings, perhaps the greatest thing that you can do for him is to give him all the tools that he needs to put himself and his project into high gear. Why could we not consider, in addition to income awards, the idea of expanding the specific budget which an outstanding young scientist or administrator is using? Maybe it would be feasible to push a modest additional amount into his budget to be used relatively free of strings to buy new equipment, say, or for additional travel funds, or for additional or higher-grade assistants?

It would be sound investment. A man who is already making efficient use of his budget is likely to be a good bet to use additional funds to the lasting benefit of the Government.

These men being honored today are already tremendously interested in their jobs. Obviously they already have the kind of supervision and leadership that encourages the best from a man. Looking at it coldly, one might be tempted to ask, "Why worry about incentives for these men? They are going at top speed already."

Well, it's true. These men and hundreds like them who are pouring their energies into creative accomplishment already, do not need the spur of reward.

But, on the other hand, they have earned reward. They have earned recognition. They have earned the gratitude of their superior officers, and of the country.

Secondly, and equally important, awards to men like these will give the even younger men and women coming up something to shoot at. It is easier to hit something you can see than to shoot in a general direction and only hope to hit the mark. This is the way you raise the flag. This is the way you spur on the young employee who is fighting his way up from obscurity, in a way which the promotional system alone cannot quite accomplish.

And, ladies and gentlemen, we must never forget that a society does not produce excellence without incentives. The Russians are learning that—and they are demonstrating that they have learned it.

We in America—grateful as we are for the unselfish spirit which keeps so many of our finest minds in Government career service—cannot afford to depend solely on the public spirit of those men and women. The incentives to leave Government to enter private industry can become too nearly irresistible.

It is only wise and prudent for those of us who want to keep these fine men and women in Government service to make it easier for them to resist the temptation.

I think we are doing a fair job of it already. I think we can do even better.

Finally, may I again thank the junior chamber of commerce and your cosponsor for undertaking this particularly fine expression of confidence and appreciation of young men in Government. It reflects the kind of thinking in the business community which is slowly erasing the stereotype of the "bureaucrat in the public trough," and replacing it with a true public understanding of the Government administrator, technician, or scientist as a hardworking, enterprising and creative individual whose contributions to his society far outweigh society's rewards.

I can't tell you how grateful I am every single day to see so many fine young men and women entering public service and coming up through the ranks to take their place in the great decision-making process of our democratic government. We need them—all of them.

In this world of the midcentury, our Nation needs their dedication, their intelligence and their courage. The struggle toward a just and secure order of things in the world lays demands upon our Government in ways that earlier generations would not have dreamed of. It is a fortunate thing for our Nation and for the Western World that the yeast of ambition and the drive to accomplish are vital forces today in the civil service of the United States.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Robert Allan Beall, supervisory physical scientist, Melting Laboratory, Division of Mineral Technology, Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, Albany, Oreg., for his outstanding accomplishments in scientific research and development, specifically for his development of the consumable-electrode method of melting and casting rare and reactive metals, and for his unusual ability to develop, train, and inspire men in new and untried scientific areas, in all of which he has shown marked ability, enthusiasm, and leadership. Because of his ingenuity, skill, fundamental training, and unflagging devotion to an extremely difficult problem, he was able to develop a melting process which revolutionized the melting and casting of highly reactive metals and at the same time retained their purity. This process was later granted a patent.

Mr. Beall's unrelenting persistence in advocating the necessity for melting zirconium in a vacuum to produce better ingots was justified recently when the Atomic Energy Commission specified that all reactor material should be melted in this fashion. All of the zirconium for the original reactor in the atomic-powered submarine, Nautilus, was melted under Mr. Beall's direction. Until he pioneered the casting of reactive metals, no sound, usable casting of commercial shapes had been produced.

Mr. Beall's interest has not been centered on applied research alone. He is pursuing an aggressive research effort on the theory and behavior of arcs. Part of this investigation has produced two high-speed moving pictures, taken at 5,000 frames per second, which reveal hitherto unsuspected arc behavior, and do much to explain the cause of commercial melting failures.

Recognizing that the arc-melting techniques developed by him offer the brightest hope for the realization of the consolidation of superpure metals and alloys in this age of new metal requirements, in which the demand is for ever-purer metals, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Robert Allan Beall.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Leo Mandelkern, chemist, Polymer Structure Section, National Bureau of Standards, for his outstanding achievements in scientific research as demonstrated by the contributions he has made to the chemistry and physics of high polymers. In this relatively new branch of science, which in recent years has produced many new materials for human use, Dr. Mandelkern is recognized today as one of the world's outstanding authorities. His pioneering research has done much to shed light on the properties and behavior of the various types of polymeric substances under varying conditions of temperature, pressure, and time.

One of Dr. Mandelkern's recent outstanding contributions is the discovery of how the glass temperature of a given type of polymer will vary with changes in its structure or with changes in composition. The value of this work can be appreciated especially when, for example, it is desired to develop a new elastic polymer that must retain its elastic properties at lower temperatures. Another one of Dr. Mandelkern's successful research projects has been concerned with the crystallization kinetics and melting temperatures of polymeric materials. This work has provided the basis for a rational selection of rubbers and plastics for specific applications, particularly in the aircraft and missile fields where extreme ranges of temperature are encountered. In another type of crystallization study, Dr. Mandelkern has made a very interesting and important scientific contribution. By appropriately crosslinking a fibrous molecule, he was the first to demonstrate that a material could be prepared having the property of not only contracting on melting and spontaneously elongating on crystallization, but also doing so in a cyclic manner without the application of any external force.

For his invaluable scientific achievements, for the inspiration he has given to the younger scientists just beginning their scientific research, and in recognition of his international reputation as a leader in the field of scientific research on polymeric materials, I am honored to make the presentation of the award to Leo Mandelkern.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Joseph E. Rall, Chief, Clinical Endocrinology Branch, National Institute of Arthritis and Metabolic Diseases, National Institutes of Health, Bethesda, Md., for the importance of his research accomplishments, the originality of his thinking, and the breadth of his knowledge. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of this man is his understanding and demonstrated ability in a wide variety of the scientific disciplines, which include biochemistry, organic chemistry, physics, mathematics, physiology, and medicine. As a result of his bringing these broad interests and abilities to bear upon one aspect of medical science—the thyroid gland and its diseases—Dr. Rall has become a recognized expert in this field.

Dr. Rall's research has provided important new information on the chemistry of the hormones secreted by the thyroid gland and the effects of these hormones on the tissues. These studies are of great importance since they have elucidated a completely new mechanism whereby the body can regulate the effects of an endocrine gland, a mechanism apart from the gland itself. This concept has explained a number of puzzling situations found in clinical medicine, and will have broad significance. His work on the treatment of thyroid cancer with radioiodine has led to a more rational use of this isotope, as well as to information applicable to the broader problem of radiation effects.

In recognition of the many facets of his abilities and performance which combine to make him a leader in the field of medical research, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Joseph E. Rall.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Douglas John Wilcox, Head, Underwater Ordnance Department, Naval Ordnance Test Station, China Lake, Calif., for his important contributions to the total national security as technical program director in the field of underwater ordnance. Mr. Wilcox, with signal success, has administered the complex internal affairs of his own department, with its dispersed laboratories, test facilities, and ranges; has integrated his program with other departments at the Naval Ordnance Test Station; and has coordinated the interlocked problems of a nationwide complex of nearly 40 major industrial and governmental organizations. These tasks have called for recognition of fleet needs, accurate foresight of areas where important advances in ordnance can be made, anticipation of administrative hurdles, and effective direction of scientific and administrative programs.

The integrated task-team approach has become Mr. Wilcox's trademark. He has visualized clearly the interrelationships of the various system components, and has established objectives, outlined courses of action, and delegated complete authority to his many task teams. His vision is evidenced by the many commitments fulfilled, and schedules met, and obstacles overcome in what is record time for weapons systems. The RAT (Rocket Assisted Torpedo), a product of such a team, may become more famous for its role in bringing effective systems engineering to the weapons system field, than for its wide implications as a piece of ordnance. With his ingratiating personality and skillful technical and administrative leadership, Mr. Wilcox has done much to stimulate the mutual respect, informal relationships, and readiness to accept one another's ideas necessary to the success of an effective weapons systems team.

For his outstanding contributions to the defense of our Nation, and in recognition of the fact that without his drive and outstanding devotion to the pursuit of the Navy's underwater ordnance programs under his management, these programs could not have been accomplished in the thorough, timely, and effective manner that has come to be associated with his name, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Douglas John Wilcox.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Wilson A. Maxim, Supervisory Meteorologist, Radiation Reconnaissance Branch, Aerial Reconnaissance Laboratory, Wright Air Development Center, Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio, who has distinguished himself through unusual and outstanding work accomplished in connection with two classified, high priority reconnaissance aircraft instrumentation programs. Previously there was no meteorological instrumentation available that would operate automatically at the desired altitudes. The scope and complexity of the programs were such that Mr. Maxim was considered the only engineer within the Aerial Reconnaissance Laboratory who could produce the required instrumentation packages within the extremely short deadline dates established by the Air Force. It was Mr. Maxim's professional ability and foresight, plus his dedication to the engineering fields of avionics and aeronautics and the science of meteorology, that enabled him to plan and execute a very comprehensive research instrumentation program. As a result of Mr. Maxim's work, the Air Force and the National Advisory Committee on Aeronautics are presently obtaining information of exceptional value regarding the upper air environment. The information is of critical concern in weapons design as well as in geophysical research. While the value of this data to the Air Force and to the Nation as a whole cannot be estimated in tangible terms, nevertheless its use will contribute markedly to more effective and economical aircraft and missile design, and to a more detailed knowledge of the composition and behavior of the atmosphere.

For the extremely unique and valuable geophysical information presently being collected routinely from high altitudes, mainly as a result of his outstanding scientific and engineering efforts, which data will permit research scientists and engineers to achieve a heretofore unparalleled understanding of certain critical aspects of the atmosphere at high altitudes, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Wilson A. Maxim.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Welcome W. Wilson, Regional Director, Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, Denton, Tex., for his outstanding leadership and creative ability in developing ways and means of enabling States and communities to combat and to repair the ravages of natural disasters. With five States under his jurisdiction—Arkansas, Louisiana, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Texas—Mr. Wilson had been in office only a short time when four of those States were stricken with a series of natural disasters, culminating in Hurricane Audrey which, in June of 1957, demolished Cameron, La. Tried by this ordeal, Mr. Wilson's previously developed plans for meeting just such a disaster revealed the imaginative planning and organizational ability that had created them, and, in largest measure, held casualties and damage to a minimum and speeded the recovery and rehabilitation of the stricken communities. Throughout the long disaster period Mr. Wilson, without regard to his own health or safety, supervised disaster operations, working long hours with minimum rest and sleep. The most significant accomplishment of the relief operation from the point of view of agency natural disaster planning was that the vast amount of Federal assistance rendered the stricken areas was supplied entirely from sources within the region, demonstrating that properly organized and administered, these resources can make a region self-supporting.

Later in 1957, Mr. Wilson and his associates revamped their regional planning in accordance with the lessons just learned. These improved operational plans were amply tested in the spring of 1958 when three of the States were again stricken by disaster. As a result of Mr. Wilson's foresight and leadership, relief, and rehabilitation operations were again conducted with maximum efficiency.

In recognition of the significantly higher degree of preparation for combating nationwide disaster resulting from an attack upon the country with nuclear weapons, and an increased public awareness of the need for civil defense preparedness, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Welcome W. Wilson.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Hermann Frederick Eilts, International Relations Officer and Officer in Charge, Baghdad Pact and SEATO Affairs, Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, Department of State, for outstanding service to his country as an expert on Middle Eastern affairs. Mr. Eilts is responsible for advising, administering, and supervising all departmental and governmental operations pertaining to the development and implementation of U.S. policy toward the Baghdad Pact. The spectrum of those activities is unusually broad and embraces the political, military, economic, counter-subversive, public relations and administrative aspects of pact operations. Mr. Eilts has discharged these heavy responsibilities in a brilliant manner. He personally has been responsible in large measure for the success of U.S. participation in pact activities with all its ramifications, an extremely complex task. One of his major contributions has been, through skillful negotiation, a reconciliation of the varying points of views and interests on the U.S. side balanced against those of the pact members in such a way as to permit a compromise of varying positions without loss of basic substance. His accomplishments are particularly noteworthy in view of the fact that the United States is not a signatory of the Baghdad Pact.

Mr. Eilts has accompanied the Secretary of State on several of his worldwide missions, and has been charged with briefing him on pact problems and the U.S. position. Mr. Eilts' ability and capacity to organize, direct, and manage an international conference has won the commendation of the Secretary.

For his genuine interest in the progress of U.S. relations with all countries of the Middle East, to which he has contributed so much, and for his friendly, understanding approach to people, particularly the sensitive people of the Middle East, which has resulted in building up important contacts at all posts at which he has served, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Hermann Frederick Eilts.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Alan M. Lovelace, senior project engineer, Polymer Section, Materials Laboratory, Wright Air Development Center, Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio, for the planning, initiation, and supervision of a comprehensive research program on high temperature polymers, a program directed toward materials for high performance aircraft and astronautical applications. The preparation of technical reports is a routine requirement, but when the research is of a caliber to warrant publication in the foremost scientific journals, this represents a superior research program. This program has culminated in the development of a number of outstanding temperature resistant elastomers, vital to the Air Force, several of which are already commercially available.

The ability to recognize new areas which can be fruitfully explored is a mark of outstanding scientific performance. Primarily due to Dr. Lovelace's recognition of the need to develop a research program in the area of inorganic polymers, in response to the Air Force's requirement for materials with higher and higher temperature capabilities, such a program was established. This program has already achieved national renown. Dr. Lovelace early recognized the close relationship between his area of competence and the field of solid propellants. This resulted in the first systematically organized research program on solid propellant chemistry.

Dr. Lovelace has established himself as an authority on fluorine chemistry through his personal research and coauthorship of numerous publications in this area, as well as papers presented at various professional meetings, and patents held in his name.

For his outstanding supervisory abilities in planning, organization, accomplishment, and leadership; his outstanding scientific competence, recognized throughout the chemical profession; his outstanding initiative in originating new areas of research; and his outstanding contributions to the advancement of chemical science, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Alan M. Lovelace.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Eugene Sheldon Staples, Special Assistant to the Director of the U.S. Information Agency, for consistently outperforming his individual assignments long before the next and more responsible assignment came due. His most outstanding successes have been in Chile, where, acting as public affairs officer, and directing the U.S. Information Service program for Chile, his performance far exceeded anything that could have been expected. Operating in an atmosphere of political and intellectual sophistication, and in competition with experienced and resourceful Communist leadership, he not only maintained the program in all its phases, but he further developed its operations and content so as greatly to increase its impact, achieving important gains in the ideological field. For example, he scored a resounding success with the Agency's atoms-for-peace exhibit; he developed a massive campaign on the theme of the Hungarian and Polish crises which directly affected political alinements in Chile; he successfully associated the theme of people's capitalism with the United States economic objectives in Chile in such a way as to provide a fresh, dynamic context for the large International Cooperation Administration program there; and he planned and launched a periodical for intellectuals which is considered the best of its kind so far produced in the Latin American area. Upon his departure from Chile he received universal and unprecedented commendation in the Chilean press, such outpouring of esteem for any departing American official being unequaled in recent years.

Back in this country, in his present position, Mr. Staples, with his customary initiative and skill, has handled important and sensitive assignments in a position which involves him in top-level deliberations, not only with USIA, but throughout the Government. He received a special, personal commendation from Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON for his superb performance under trying, often hazardous conditions while serving as press control officer with the Vice President's entourage on that official's recent tour of South America.

In recognition of his continuous topflight performance in a variety of important and difficult missions, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Eugene Sheldon Staples.

The 11th annual Arthur S. Flemming award is presented to Thomas G. Meeker, General Counsel, Securities and Exchange Commission, for his exceptionally keen and trained legal mind, his unusually intelligent and sound approach to highly technical and difficult problems in the very sensitive and complex fields of securities and finance, and for his unique executive and administrative ability. In addition to acting as the chief law officer of the Commission, directing and coordinating all of its legal work and acting as its chief adviser on all legal matters, Mr. Meeker serves as the Commission's liaison officer with the Bureau of the Budget on legislative matters, and as its staff liaison representative with the Council of Economic Advisers. He also represents the Commission before committees of Congress. Mr. Meeker has consistently discharged all of these responsibilities with distinction.

Among his outstanding contributions, Mr. Meeker has proved himself to be a most persuasive advocate in presenting or defending the Agency's position before Federal trial and appellate courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court.

Aside from his achievements both as a lawyer and as an administrator in enabling the Commission to carry out effectively its statutory objectives, Mr. Meeker has contributed greatly to a better understanding on the part of the investing public and the legal profession, of the significant role played by the Commission and the impact of its work on the Nation's economy. He has lectured widely throughout the country before business and civic associations, legal and other professional societies, and in colleges and universities.

In recognition of the high regard in which he is held not only by the Securities and Exchange Commission, but also by the bench and the bar and the leaders of industry and the financial community, and for his untiring efforts and devotion to the principles of public service, I am honored to make the presentation of this award to Thomas G. Meeker.

EXPANSION OF THE SCHOOL LUNCH PROGRAM

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I rise to express deep disappointment at the inadequacy of funds in the 1960 budget for carrying on and expanding the schoollunch program.

Over the years, this splendid program has established an impressive record for improving the health of our schoolchildren by providing nourishing daily lunches. In addition, it also provides a useful outlet for our surplus commodities—including milk, cheese, butter, flour, and other products of the farms across the Nation.

In Wisconsin over 228,000 students are now being served in our schools. It is expected that next year an additional 20,000 will participate. Nationally, over 12 million boys and girls are now enjoying nourishing lunches; and this figure is expected to increase to over 13 million in the fiscal year 1960.

During the current year, Federal funds amounting to somewhat over $443 million were provided for the program. However, as proposed in the 1960 budget, the level of expenditure would be slashed by about one-third. In view of the increase of 1 million students participating in the program, the cutback in funds, if carried out, would be a serious curtailment.

As proposed, the new budget recommends $98.6 million for next year. This amount is definitely inadequate. The Congress, I believe, should provide additional funds to carry forward this fine program. To continue at approximately the current level of Federal participation, about $155 million will be required for the next fiscal year—about $10 million more than the amount for the current year.

However, my colleagues will recall that in recent years proposals for carrying forward this program have had almost the unanimous approval of the Congress.

I want to stress that this is not solely a federally supported program. Rather, it depends, for the most part, on local initiative and local financing for its support.

In Wisconsin, for example, our local school districts are matching Federal appropriations with about $5 for every $1 of Federal money.

If the funds are curtailed, this very useful program would be unwisely crippled.

I want to point out, also, that, according to reports of the Department of Agriculture, a large percentage of the new schools being constructed contain "built in" facilities for serving lunches to the students. These new schools, as well as existing ones, need early assurance of support so the authorities can go ahead with plans for the next year.

I respectfully call the attention of our colleagues on the Appropriations Committee to the need for additional money for the program.

As necessary, I shall propose legislation to attempt to assure that at least $155 million level is provided for continuation and expansion of the school lunch project for the next fiscal year.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

WHAT SHOULD THE UNITED STATES EXHIBIT AT THE MOSCOW FAIR?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as all of us recognize, our continuing struggle against communism has many facets—economic, military, ideological, cultural, and spiritual. To meet the challenge in each of these spheres, we need the benefit of all the constructive thinking available.

To a large degree, the task, until now, has been to meet the Soviet threat in the scientific and military fields. Now—for a time, at least—there appears to be a stalemate, although this involves, among other things, periodic tests of our courage and purpose in deterring communism.

During this stalemate—based on fear of destruction—it is particularly important not only that we meet the Soviet advances in the nonmilitary fields, but also that we develop as constructive a U.S. program in these fields as possible.

As we know, American and Russian officials have signed agreements providing for exchange of such scientific and cultural exhibitions next summer in Moscow and New York.

The Moscow Fair will, of course, represent one of our few opportunities to present to the Russian people a picture—undistorted by propaganda—of our American way of life.

Currently, planning for the fair is now well along. The displays will include, among other things, films, publications, art exhibits, and other illustrations of how Americans work, live, play, and participate in community and national life.

In a recent issue of the Christian Science Monitor, Mr. Roscoe Drummond, in a special article, conveyed some constructive ideas on what he felt the U.S. exhibit should cover. Among other things, these included: First, displays to illustrate the reality of our freedom to dissent—freedom to speak, to write, to publish, without Government interference; second, our exhibit should show that we have a society which has the capacity to achieve great social changes without revolution and without purges; and third, our exhibit should show that we have an electoral process by which there can be a change in our Government officials without murder or exile.

To convey this impression—insofar as possible—would, I believe, be an important addition to the fair exhibit.

I request unanimous consent that Mr. Drummond's article be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT SHOULD UNITED STATES EXHIBIT?

(By Roscoe Drummond)

WASHINGTON.—For 6 weeks this summer several million Soviet citizens, whose minds have long been shielded from the outside world by Soviet censorship, will have the opportunity to see with their own eyes some things about the United States and Americans—as Americans themselves see them.

To do this the Government and private industry are jointly preparing an American National Exhibition for which they have leased an area of approximately two city blocks in Sokoliniki Park, a 15-minute subway ride from downtown Moscow.

By reciprocal agreement, the U.S.S.R. will hold an exhibition in the Coliseum in New York City for a month beginning June 28.

The purpose of the United States exhibit will be to present "a corner of America" in the heart of Moscow for as many to visit as can be attracted.

The general manager of the exhibit is Harold C. McClellan, Los Angeles industrialist and former Assistant Secretary of Commerce for International Affairs. The coordinator of the interested Federal agencies is Ambassador George V. Allen, Administrator of the United States Information Agency.

The concept of the exhibit is now well along and it aims to project an image of the United States through displays, films, publications, fine arts, and the performing arts. They will reflect how Americans live, work, learn, produce, consume, and play, and what they are and what they stand for—their cultural and spiritual values.

The major categories of the exhibit will be: America learns (education), America explores (science and research), America creates (art), America travels, America plays, and American community life.

There can be no doubt that these displays can give the Soviet visitors a beginning understanding of the United States which they haven't had before. But two question marks inevitably arise:

Isn't there too much in this exhibit which simply parallels aspects of the Soviet Union and not enough of what separates life in the United States from life in the U.S.S.R.?

Couldn't this deficiency be met, in part at least, by having one category of display devoted to how the American people govern themselves?

We both have natural science. We both have technology. We both have culture—as Pasternak has wonderfully shown for the Soviets. But what has American society got which the Soviets haven't? The answer, it seems to me, is:

1. We have freedom to dissent—freedom of people to speak, freedom of writers to write, freedom of printers to print, freedom of publishers to publish without Government interference. The Government is denied the power to interfere under the Bill of Rights.

2. We have a society which has the capacity to achieve great social changes without revolution and without purges. Examples: The first 100 days of the New Deal, the Supreme Court decision on public school integration.

3. We have a society within which some 90 million eligible voters have the right and the means to remove one set of Government officials and install others.

Here, I feel, is the missing category in the United States-Moscow exhibit—how the United States governs itself. There could be an exciting documentary film portraying some of the incidents and events in American history which illustrate the distinguishing aspects of our way of life.

There could be shots of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the drafting of the Constitution which bound the Union together, examples of how the Bill of Rights works, scenes of the functioning of Congress, the nominating conventions, a Communist rally at Madison Square Garden, Roosevelt, Willkie, Dewey, Truman, Eisenhower, Stevenson on the stump, shots of libraries showing books in use on all sides of all controversies, the Supreme Court on decision day. There is no shortage of material.

It strikes me that many of our exhibits in natural science, technology, and culture will likely produce the Soviet reaction: "Why, we have much of this, some that is better."

Wouldn't there be merit, therefore, in exhibiting, without any political argument, some of the things the Soviets do not possess by showing American democracy at work?

DANGERS OF INFLATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I was very much impressed by an article entitled "What the French Have Found Out About Inflation," which I read in the Reader's Digest. The subheading of the article is "A Case History of the Worst Swindle a Government Can Commit Against Its Citizens."

The other day, on the floor of the Senate, I called attention to the fact—although it was not noticed at all by the newspapers—that in this country there are 40 million holders of U.S. bonds, there are 120 million insurance policyholders, and there are annuitants and those who are living on social security. At that time I asked: "What are we doing about inflation? What are we doing about the dollar? Are we going to see it decline to 10 cents?"

Mr. President, the article to which I have referred is very much in point; and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD, following my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT THE FRENCH HAVE FOUND OUT ABOUT INFLATION—A CASE HISTORY OF THE WORST SWINDLE A GOVERNMENT CAN COMMIT AGAINST ITS CITIZENS

(By Andre Visson)

(Born in Russia, educated in Western Europe, Andre Visson is a close student of international affairs and European politics. During World War II he served in Col. William J. Donovan's Office of Coordinator of Information, and subsequently organized the Eastern Europe department of the Office of War Information. Currently living in Paris, he is closely associated with many French political and business leaders.)

With typical French thrift and thought for the future, Roger Letourneau sold his house in Normandy and bought life annuities that would provide a minimum of comfort and security for himself and his wife in their later years.

That was in 1927.

Today, as a result of France's destructive inflation, the cost of living is 37 times what it was in 1927. And Roger Letourneau's widow has been cheated out of the comfort he sacrificed his home to provide for her.

As an "economically weak person"—to use the French official term for several million persons living in similar penury—Marie Letourneau receives from the Government a yearly allowance of 32,000 francs ($76). This peanut subsidy, added to her meager annuity, is of negligible help in keeping the wolf from her door. The pound of butter she could have bought for 10 francs in 1927 now costs 410 francs. When marketing, she buys one egg at a time, a little milk every other day, a slice of ham once a week. Thus has inflation victimized Marie Letourneau.

Her neighbor, Joseph Thomas, cabinetmaker, retired in 1938. He was 63, and in 40 years of work he had built up a nest egg of 2 million francs (about $57,000). Part of the sum was in savings banks, part in government annuities, part in corporate bonds. He looked forward to a pleasant life in retirement. But Thomas reckoned without inflation.

Today he still has his prewar yearly income of 60,000 francs, supplemented by the Government allowance for the underprivileged. And his total present income is the equivalent of about $220 a year. He has had to sell practically everything he owned; during the winter he shivers in his shabby room, for he can't afford to buy coal at its present cost of 1,000 francs per 100 pounds.

In the same dreary and crumbling apartment building, 78-year-old Alfred Mercier leads a no less miserable existence. After 30 years of work for the Government, he retired in 1940 with an annual pension of 50,000 francs. A thrifty man with foresight to plan for old age, Mercier had, in 1920, bought insurance which would pay another 50,000 francs' annuity after age 60.

Poor Mercier was to discover that his dream of old-age security would turn into a nightmare of poverty. Only 7 years after his retirement, his 100,000 francs had lost 85 percent of their purchasing power. To buy what he could have bought for 100,000 francs in 1940 he would have needed in 1947 an income of 666,000 francs. To live at a bare subsistence level today, Alfred Mercier has had to find a part-time job as an accountant. He is 78 years old, and his sight is failing.

These victims of inflation are by no means exceptions. Some 4 million elderly men and women, almost one-tenth of France's population, have yearly incomes below the officially established "vital minimum" of 330,000 to 340,000 francs (about $800) a year.

Every Frenchman who put his savings in Government bonds or annuities, whether before or after World War II, has lost the major share of his capital. The scores of thousands of people who, in 1944–45, invested in the 3-percent bonds of the liberation loan are today getting the same interest they did 13 years ago, whereas the cost of living is 10 times what it was then. And, were these French men and women to sell their bonds now on the Paris Stock Exchange, they would get only about half the price they paid in 1945—and in depreciated francs at that.

And consider the disaster to more than a million World War I veterans whose once adequate pensions are now worth 70 cents a month or less.

No wonder that practically everybody in France considers inflation one of the worst national ills. Says Antoine Pinay, former Premier whom De Gaulle put in charge of the treasury, "Inflation corrupts everything—a balanced budget, investments, job security, social legislation, the moral health of all classes, even national prestige abroad."

How is it, then, that the thrifty, sensible French people let this evil overwhelm them?

In the answer we find a frightening example of how a disastrous inflation can develop when a government continually spends vastly larger sums of money than it can collect in taxes.

The staggering costs of two world wars, plus postwar military campaigns in Indochina and north Africa, were the main causes of inflation in France. Besides the heavy burden of military expenditures and the cost of postwar industrial reequipment, however, the state undertook the additional load of social charges and price-supporting subsidies. And, simultaneously, the value of the franc slipped lower and lower. Thus, by allowing its currency to go on losing purchasing power, the Government has been taking away from its citizens with its left hand what it was so generously giving them with its right.

This obsession of the French politicians with making their constituents happy at any cost—even at the risk of compelling them to pay a high price tomorrow for the favors bestowed upon them today—has also been responsible for the ever-growing number of people on the Government payroll. France today has to support an immensely costly, overstaffed, and often inefficient Government machinery. A report made in 1958 reveals that, out of a total French labor force of 21 million, some 3¼ million men and women—civil servants, military personnel, workers in nationalized industries—depend for their income on the state. Including individuals on Government pensions, the total number is about 6½ million.

The cost of all these jobs is an additional spur to inflation. There are others. Next to Russia and Norway, France is one of the most socialized countries in the world. In theory, at least, the Government pays 80 percent of all doctor and druggist bills. It pays for practically all education, from nursery school through university. The average French mother who cannot go to work because she has to care for children is also rewarded. Families of three or more children receive other perquisites. They ride, for example, at reduced rates on Government-owned buslines, railroads, and subways.

The result of all this socialist generosity for the French has been unfortunate, however. The French people have learned that, though it is very nice for the state to take the best possible care of its citizens—to help them with all kinds of economic subsidies, to provide jobs for them—the state needs ever more money to cover the cost of this generosity. And to get more money it finds itself having to print it.

On the eve of World War I, France had banknotes in circulation for 6 billion francs (then about $1.2 billion); at the end of the war, there were notes in circulation for 30 billion francs. Just before World War II, the volume of French banknotes went up to 142 billion francs. At the end of World War II, it jumped to 650 billion. Now it is up to 3,400 billion francs (about $8.1 billion at the present rate). Thus the French Government Printing Office has become a manufacturing agent for the nation's inflation.

The consequences have been disastrous. In last 2 years, while wages rose only slightly, Frenchmen paid 200 percent more for potatoes, 100 percent more for carrots. Ham, always popular on the French dining table, has doubled in price within the last 18 months. Says Albert Morieux, a grocer in Paris' populous Montparnasse area: "With the cost of living doubled since last year, people are restricting their purchases, resulting in a big cut in business for us." Thus inflation is ruining customer and shopkeeper alike.

So, the French are beginning to realize that there is not much difference between the state and a private person, as far as a budget is concerned. Neither can live beyond its means very long. To be sure, the state credit is infinitely greater than that of the richest individual. But even a national government's credit cannot last forever. When the state goes too heavily into debt its citizens are, finally, the ones to carry the burden. And among them it is those who live on a fixed income who feel the burden most painfully. French experience means that social welfare and old-age security, achieved at the cost of inflation, are neither welfare nor security. They are nothing but frauds and swindles.

This grim picture of what happens when a government tries to live beyond its income is on display today not only in France but in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Peru, and other lands. The warning has not yet struck home in the United States—and the question is still to be decided whether it will be heeded soon enough to prevent disaster.

In France the people have found that, contrary to all the glowing promises of their politicians, the state can give them nothing free. One way or the other, the citizens have to pay in the end. If they do not pay in taxes they pay in inflation, which is the highest and the cruelest tax of all.

RETIREMENT OF EX-REPRESENTATIVE HARRIS ELLSWORTH, OF ROSEBURG, OREG., AS CHAIRMAN OF THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, early in 1957 President Eisenhower appointed ex-Representative Harris Ellsworth, of Roseburg, Oreg., as chairman of the Civil Service Commission. Mr. Ellsworth had just been defeated for reelection by CHARLES O. PORTER, of Eugene, after one earlier unsuccessful foray by Mr. PORTER against Representative Ellsworth in the 1954 elections.

Because of the partisan nature of this appointment, a number of Democrats in Oregon urged me to oppose confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Ellsworth and, if necessary, to voice the objection of "personally obnoxious." I was in a position to block the appointment, in view of my seat on the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, before which Mr. Ellsworth's nomination had to come, for consideration.

However, I decided that the President had a right to name a Civil Service chairman of his choice, and that no grounds of moral turpitude existed against ex-Representative Ellsworth. I decided to support the appointment. To the great credit and magnanimity of Representative CHARLES O. PORTER, he urged upon me a similar course, despite the two bitter political campaigns between Mr. Ellsworth and himself.

After 2 years of service, Harris Ellsworth is now retiring voluntarily as Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. I am happy to report that he has been a good Commission Chairman. He has brought credit to our State and to himself.

Jerry Kluttz, Federal Government personnel editor for the Washington Post and Times Herald, has written an article, dated February 23, 1959, in which he praises Chairman Ellsworth for making an impressive and favorable record. He particularly cites Mr. Ellsworth for being an appointee who has "done an above-average job as Chairman of the Civil Service Commission."

In our country, it has become a pattern of Government for defeated Senators and Representatives to be appointed to administrative and executive posts. Both Republicans and Democrats have relied on this device to take care of the party faithful.

I do not particularly favor such a policy, I must admit. The present Republican administration has used it excessively. Yet, in all fairness, the fact that a man or woman has served in the Senate or House should not disqualify him or her from service in the administrative arm of Government. It think it is a particularly auspicious event when one of these purely political and strictly partisan appointments turns out well. This has happened in the case of Harris Ellsworth, of Roseburg, Oreg., as chairman of the Civil Service Commission.

As Mr. Ellsworth retires from that position, Mr. President, I desire to wish him good fortune and good health during the years ahead. I feel certain that I speak for many citizens of our State of Oregon—as well as for many Federal Government employees—when I voice these remarks.

I ask unanimous consent that the article entitled, "Impressive Record Left By Ellsworth as Civil Service Commission Chairman," written by Jerry Kluttz, be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post and Times Herald, Feb. 23, 1959]

IMPRESSIVE RECORD LEFT BY ELLSWORTH AS CSC CHAIRMAN

(By Jerry Kluttz)

Harris Ellsworth, who retires this week, is generally regarded as having done an above-average job as Chairman of the Civil Service Commission during the past 2 years.

His record is even more impressive when one considers his partisan political background as a critic of civil service. A powerful House Member during the early days of the first Eisenhower administration, Ellsworth joined those who demanded that the new administration be given a free hand to make appointments to jobs in grade 12 and above. The civil service career system would have been mangled if that had happened and the Chairman has long since realized it.

To his credit, Ellsworth didn't try to force his preconceived ideas on how the CSC should operate when he took over as its leader. Instead, he dug in, studied, listened, and usually came out with solid answers.

He leaves CSC as a stanch and enthusiastic supporter of its merit system. No one has a higher regard for CSC's own staff and the Government's civil service employees. He feels that Congress in particular and the public in general simply don't realize the rigid standards that must be met to acquire civil service jobs. No large private concern, he observed, subjects its applicants to such tests and clearances. "As a result," he says, "the Government has an elite corps of individuals and I have real respect for them."

Despite the fact that he was a political appointee, Ellsworth worked for the appointment of a career man to succeed him as Chairman. He regards his successor, Roger Jones, as just about the best qualified person that could be found.

Looking back, the Chairman says he's astonished by the lack of political pressure he was subjected to. Because of his 14 years in the House he fully expected the opposite to happen. But in the 2 years he had only a single experience of what he described as "unpleasant pressure" and he quickly rejected it.

Otherwise, he related, "I've never been aware of pressure as such. I never felt I had to do something I was opposed to. I never was made to feel that I was obligated to do what someone else wanted done. I honestly feel that this healthy condition is due to the fact that most people now realize that the CSC services other Federal agencies and has few favors to dispense."

Looking ahead, he's convinced of the need for a new system to fix the salaries of Federal employees and officials. The Chairman would like to see a salary board composed of experts set up in CSC; the board to recommend rate changes based on changed conditions in industry and the Nation's economy, and for the rates to become effective within 60 days unless the Congress vetoed them by a two-thirds vote.

Ellsworth also would like to see the Senate drop its requirement for confirmation of postmasters, a system he feels is outmoded and cumbersome and reflects on the merit system. He's outspoken against the secrecy curtain that frequently covers official discussions of employee problems. He regards the secrecy thrown around the O'Connell Cabinet Committee on Federal pay as prejudicing people against its many sense-making proposals. He'd also like to see the Congress give more time and attention to the Government's personnel problems.

HAWAIIAN STATEHOOD

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, 3 months ago I accompanied my distinguished colleague from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL] and Representatives LEO W. O'BRIEN, of New York; E. Y. BERRY, of South Dakota; and B. F. SISK, of California, to the Territory of Hawaii. The purpose of our visit was to conduct an informal, in-the-field investigation of present conditions in Hawaii, as they relate to the impending question of Hawaiian statehood. We came away impressed, not only with how fully qualified these islands are for statehood, but also with the need for prompt action in this session of Congress, in order that these worthy Americans should be no longer denied their rightful place in our Union of States.

Our visit was the occasion for editorial comment by the newspapers of Honolulu, reflecting the ardent interest there in the achievement of statehood.

I ask unanimous consent that certain of these editorials be included at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, Nov. 25, 1958]

HERE TO STUDY STATEHOOD

Two U.S. Senators and three Congressmen are welcomed to Hawaii with special interest and hope.

They arrived Monday to conduct what some have described as possibly the last pre-statehood investigation of the Territory.

The visitors to whom the people of the Territory extend aloha are Senators FRANK CHURCH, of Idaho, and JOHN CARROLL, of Colorado, both Democrats, and Representatives LEO W. O'BRIEN, New York Democrat; E. Y. BERRY, South Dakota Republican; and B. F. SISK, California Democrat.

Representative O'BRIEN is chairman of the House Territories Subcommittee to which statehood legislation will be referred in the 86th Congress.

He has said that the purpose of the trip is to bring the Congress up to date on alleged Communist influence in the islands. Communist influence on Hawaii is one of the excuses most frequently used by opponents of statehood for their opposition to Hawaii.

The minority report of the House Interior Committee—unfavorable to statehood—linked the ILWU and communism.

On that point, our visitors will quickly find that the ILWU in the 1958 elections November 4 took a series of lickings.

Its political influence can't be rated high right now.

Hawaii welcomes this visit as a special opportunity to bring the record up to date. The visiting Congressmen will find, as the many others who have preceded them have found, that Hawaii meets every bona fide test of statehood, stands ready, willing, and worthy to enter the Union.

The visit—no junket—is extremely useful to Hawaii and the Nation. We hope it will clear away for the 86th Congress whatever misconceptions may still exist about Hawaii's right to join the Union as a State.

We pledge to our congressional visitors every cooperation in the achievement of their objective.

And we trust that they will return to Washington more convinced than ever that they should give us cordial, firm support immediately after the 86th Congress opens next January.

[From the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, Dec. 2, 1958]

NO POSSIBILITY FOR COMMONWEALTH

U.S. Senator FRANK CHURCH, here to study Hawaii's qualifications for statehood, has received several letters urging that Congress grant Hawaii commonwealth status.

These are undoubtedly either from the small group which formed the Commonwealth Party in the 1958 campaign; or from others who support commonwealth government under the illusion that if it were granted Hawaii, we'd be free from forking over Federal taxes, as Puerto Rico is free.

Senator CHURCH, an active and firm friend of Hawaii statehood, comments that there's no real possibility that the Congress will ever approve commonwealth status for Hawaii.

That has been pointed out many, many times since commonwealth agitation began here. But it does not end the activities of the commonwealth supporters.

There are not many of these. In the November 4 elections their total votes were tiny. But they gather some strength each time Congress turns down statehood for Hawaii.

If the 86th Congress, to convene in January, again bypasses, blockades, or beats down the Hawaii statehood bill, commonwealth advocates will gain a few more votes. They will be more aggressive before and during the 1960 campaign. They will point to nonaction by the Congress as proof that Hawaii will never get statehood.

Senator CHURCH and his fellow Congressmen can meet the illogical but plausible arguments of the commonwealthers most successfully by prompt, affirmative and cordial action to pass the Hawaii statehood bill early in the 86th Congress.

[From the Honolulu Advertiser, Dec. 3, 1958]

CHURCH ON STATEHOOD

Hawaii which has been vocal for decades in pressing its case for statehood, heard that case expressed by a friendly visitor on Saturday in words that could hardly be improved upon.

U.S. Senator FRANK CHURCH, of Idaho, said granting of statehood will complete the American Union and achieve something of great significance for America and for all people everywhere who believe in self-government. Conversely, he added, failure to grant statehood would be a tremendous impediment to America in its posture before the world, and a grievous blow to democracy.

"If we give statehood to Hawaii we will complete our American Union. If we fail to give it the only reason that will be commented upon in the world at large will be the racial complexion of the people of Hawaii."

That is thoughtful language by a thoughtful statesman.

[From the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, Jan. 1, 1959]

HAWAII'S GREATEST PROGRESS LIES AHEAD—STATEHOOD IS THE GOAL FOR 1959

The Star-Bulletin's "This Is Hawaii" edition today is dedicated to a bright and glowing future for Hawaii.

It reviews the past only to the extent that it is necessary to provide the framework for the future. This annual New Year edition is far more than the usual summing up of what has happened during the year.

From the record of the past it seeks to chart the logical courses of the exciting new world before us in these mid-Pacific islands.

The story is told in scores of specially written articles, by trained reporters of the Star-Bulletin's staff, and by professional experts intimately associated with the fields on which they write.

The broad outlook is described by James H. Shoemaker, Bank of Hawaii vice president and economist whose conservative optimism has won him the respect of the business community, and the interest of laymen who feel the stimulus of his analyses.

Except for three uncertainties—labor-management relations, the level of military defense spending, and the rate of population growth—all major factors indicate a great and growing boom.

Add to the favorable factors outlined in the Shoemaker forecast the early achievement of statehood—and Hawaii's immediate future is indeed bright. For statehood will hasten many of the gains projected for the years ahead.

This newspaper since its founding has been dedicated to the cause of statehood.

Statehood will bring to the people of Hawaii not only political equality with our fellow citizens of the U.S. mainland, but add to the effectiveness of our Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

The cause of statehood for Hawaii is not one of political partisanship. It is a cause in which the major political parties of Hawaii have joined aggressively, determinedly and unitedly.

The one most significant development of 1959, apart from the possibility of statehood, is the inauguration of the jet transportation age in Hawaii. It will have expanding effects not only on the tourist industry, but on migration to the islands from the mainland, and the establishment of new businesses here.

Quick communication and transportation, by strengthening the links between Hawaii and the mainland, open up broader avenues for commerce and investment.

It requires no scholarly background in economics to foresee great things for Hawaii in the immediate future. The signs are all around us.

What demands will this great growth make of the people of Hawaii?

We will have to think in far more expansive terms than has been our practice in the past.

We will have to realize that with this growth must come a rapid increase in public services.

And, as travel to Hawaii increases, we must constantly remind ourselves of another vital requisite: To develop our travel industry we must scrupulously preserve those unique features of Hawaiian life that appeal to the visitor.

Never allow them to become submerged in the complex industrial community we are creating.

And it will become increasingly important to organize our development, to tie loose ends together in a general growth plan that will preserve what needs to be preserved while encouraging economic development to sustain a multiplying population.

There will be many new problems to tax our resourcefulness and our ingenuity. But we have the people, the abilities, the devotion to meet and master these problems.

So we enter 1959 with prospects high, confident that, great as has been Hawaii's economic, industrial and civil and cultural growth in the past, there need be no sag in the foreseeable future.

DEATH OF JAMES M. WILKINSON

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words about Jim Wilkinson, whose unfortunate passing has saddened all of us in the Senate. Mr. Wilkinson left Washington on Thursday for his home in Erwin, Tenn. He died on Friday.

Amid the busy rush of the Senate's affairs, Jim Wilkinson was a keeper of our doors and superintendent of messengers for many years. He was one of the finest men I have ever known. Before he came to Washington to serve his Government with courtesy and distinction, he had served his hometown of Erwin, Tenn., well for many other years as mayor of that city. This man, who sat outside the door of this Chamber as we spoke and argued and tended as best we could to the business of our Government, made our work easier and, in his quiet and efficient way, smoothed the way for us and for those who work with us.

We have lost a real friend and a true public servant in the passing of Jim Wilkinson.

AGRICULTURAL PRICE SUPPORTS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, for the past several years I have been advocating that the high, rigid price support program be repealed and that the Secretary of Agriculture be given greater discretionary authority to lower the support prices on the basic crops.

It has been my contention that the law as written was of far greater benefit to the large farmers than it was to the small farmers. In fact, the high rigid support program is little more than a Government guarantee on the operations of corporate type farming and actually encourages and underwrites absentee ownership to the detriment of the small farmers.

Today I shall incorporate in the RECORD statistics showing that the major benefits under this program have been going to the very large corporate operators.

This report will show that in 1957 just two operators received over $2½ million support on two basic crops produced. The first, the Producer's Rice Mill, Inc., Stuttgart, Ark., received Government support on rice produced in 1957 in the amount of $1,460,902.11.

The second, the Delta & Pine Land Co., Scott, Miss., received $1,157,502.35 Government support on cotton which they produced in 1957.

As a comparison, I call attention to the fact that these two operators received from the Government in support of their 1957 crops over five times as much as the total amount of price support received by all the farmers of the State of Delaware on all the crops they produced in 2 years—1956 and 1957.

These two companies alone in 1957 received more in price support for their crops than did all of the farmers in the State of Maryland combined.

The $1,460,000 which one of these companies received in support of their rice crops in 1957 represents an amount double that which was received by all the farmers in the State of Pennsylvania on all their crops for the same year.

As a further comparison, there were three companies—one in Mississippi, one in Arkansas, and one in California—which received over $3,400,000 in price support operations on the 1957 crops. That is greater than the total amount received on all the crops produced in 1957 by all the farmers in the four States of Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, combined.

There were 18 large operations in the United States, any one of which in 1957 received over four times as much as the total amount received on all the crops by all the farmers in our State of Delaware last year.

I cite these figures with the comparisons to emphasize that the Government's price support program, as the law is now written, is definitely not in the best interests of the bona fide American farmer. Instead of being in the best interests of the family type operation, the Federal Government under the present law is with the taxpayers' money encouraging and financing and consolidation of the farms under absentee ownership.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a report showing amounts paid in price support operations last year; first, those over $1 million; second, those over $500,000; third, those over $250,000; finally, those over $100,000, relating to recipients.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SOUND SPORTS BILL

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the people of the country are interested in the survival of minor league baseball as well as the major leagues. If either is to survive it is necessary that some protection be given to the minor leagues. Several bills are pending in Congress aimed at a solution to this problem.

I have introduced a bill, S. 886, which I hope will be discussed and considered by those interested in team sports. This bill was discussed by F. M. Williams, of the Nashville Tennessean, in his column of February 7.

I ask unanimous consent that the column be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEFAUVER CONTROL BILL FIRST TO TAKE SIDE OF MINORS

(By F. M. Williams)

What is this that the tall Tennessean, Senator ESTES KEFAUVER, has done to the bellicose boys along the professional sports front? What's in this bill he introduced into the Congress of the United States this week that has evoked such a strange silence from the bosses of guys who play for pay in baseball, football, basketball, and hockey?

Bert Bell made an objection to that part of Kefauver's bill adjusting the national football league's drafting of college boys so as to give the players the right to say whether they want to sign with the club drafting them. But, otherwise, discussion of the bill has been very limted and very private, especially from baseball.

SOME SEE BASEBALL SHOCKED INTO SILENCE

There are some who say that the sheer audacity of Congress hinting it should have any control over some 16 men who run the multi-million-dollar business shocked the baseball folks into silence. The less cynical think that KEFAUVER's bill is such a long stride in the right direction that it would be unwise to make comment until they better acquaint themselves with its provisions. Two things that every minor leaguer readily believes must go into almost immediate effact, if they are to survive, are provided for in the proposal.

One concerns television. Kefauver's bill would prohibit a major league game from being shown in a minor league city on the day that city's team was playing at home. The other concerns control of players. The Tennessee Senator wants no major league club to have direct control over more than 80 men. While these appeal to the boys in the bushes, as the minor league have become known, they probably are not so well received in the majors.

But even the big league bosses are pleased over Kefauver's proposal to make the reserve clause legal. The reserve clause is that part of a player's contract which binds him forever to the club he originally signs with, unless sold or traded or given his release. Without it baseball could not operate, and under existing antitrust laws, the Supreme Court has broadly hinted it might someday rule it illegal.

The greatest thing about KEFAUVER's proposal is that it is the first to emerge with a minor league viewpoint. All the others now pending before Congress were written and introduced with no consideration of the name below the top level, and in effect, might as well never have been introduced to start with. Baseball's own rules, dictated by the big league owners, adequately care for the big leagues. Except, of course, that in murdering the minors the majors are committing suicide, for they are destroying the source of the material that keeps their show going.

THEN THERE'S PROBLEM OF TOO MUCH CONTROL

It has long been apparent that Federal control is the only control that can succeed, because it is the only law that will be observed by the majors. Then, of course, comes the problem of stopping Federal control before it gets to be a worse threat than now confronts baseball.

But getting back to KEFAUVER's bill. The question arises as to how control of players and control of television will be most immediately felt. The answer to controlled television is that it will boost the gate receipts of the minors. The answer to the player control is a little more complex.

General Manager Bill McCarthy, of the Nashville Vols, who testified last summer before KEFAUVER's Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly Laws, and whose views are evident in several portions of the bill, thinks the first benefit to the minors would be in the matter of bonus players. He believes it will reduce considerably the number of untried prospects to whom the majors will pay tremendous sums of money to sign a contract. That will mean, he thinks, more younger players casting their lot with minor league clubs, developing their talents on the farms, and then being sold to the majors.

CERTAIN TO IMPROVE YOUNG TALENT

It certainly will improve talent from the top down. More of it will be available, for one thing, and more players will have renewed hopes of getting to the majors, for another. That will give them a better attitude as well as more incentive to bear down all the time.

Coming as it does on the heels of the terrific expression of confidence by Nashville fans in the game when they bought stock in Vols, Inc., the proposed legislation serves to further brighten the future of the minors. Control of television and of player contracts, along with baseball's own recent decision to try an unrestricted draft for 1 year, are the three greatest boosts to the minors since Branch Rickey started the farm system, and involuntarily, started the trend that now approaches dictatorship in baseball.

THE UKRAINE: THE TRAGEDY OF ITS ENSLAVEMENT

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the ruthless subjugation by Russia of the once free Ukraine long has been a stark notice of the cruel determination of despotic Communists to enslave and shackle independent peoples wherever and whenever possible.

Recently remarks were made in this Senate on the occasion of the 41st anniversary of the declaration of independence of the Ukraine. Tragically, that independence was short-lived and the people of the Ukraine became the first victims of communistic aggression.

Less than 2 weeks ago, the proceedings of the Senate were opened with a prayer by Msgr. Nicholas Babak, of Stamford, Conn., who voiced a universal hope of all freedom-loving individuals that the Iron Curtain eventually can be torn down and the people of the Ukraine emerge again into the atmosphere of independence and self-determination. I and other Senators listened to the prayer at that time. I am sure that hope is entertained by all Members of this body.

The enslavement of the Ukraine is a constant and continuing challenge to all lovers of democratic processes. Although unfortunately the hopes of early liberation are not bright, the United States, as a champion of freedom and independence, must foster and nourish the continuing faith of all peoples of Ukrainian heritage that their homeland's slavery ultimately will be ended.

The firm anti-Communist stand of hundreds of Americans of Ukrainian descent was affirmed not long ago at a rally in Los Angeles which demonstrated unmistakably that the 50 million people of the Ukraine have not been deserted or forgotten. The rally adopted a series of resolutions which should hearten these and all other Communist-enslaved peoples. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a signal of continuing support from America, these courageous, forthright resolutions.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the U.S. citizens of Ukrainian descent and residents of Los Angeles, Calif., gathered today on Saturday, December 20, 1958, at the Patriotic Hall, 1816 South Figueroa Street, Los Angeles, for a manifestation commemorating the 25th anniversary of the horrible famine, deliberately caused by Red Moscow in Ukraine, after listening to proper lectures, unanimously adopt the following resolutions:

"1. Commemorating the 25th anniversary of the horrible famine, deliberately organized by the Russian imperialists to enslave Ukraine, we join the action of all Ukrainians in the free world and we honor the glorious memory of all those who had lost their lives in the years of the mentioned famine proving their strivings for freedom and independence of Ukraine.

"2. We state that the only guilty and the only organizer of the mentioned famine in Ukraine was Red Moscow and we pledge to do our best by all means in order to condemn and to punish the guilty one for that first case of mass genocide.

"3. We are sending our cordial greetings to all Ukrainians in our home country and abroad, in freedom and in slavery, and especially to all those who remained in Ukraine without stopping their fight for freedom and independence of Ukraine and who continue their active and passive resistance against Russian dictators and their governors and servants in Ukraine.

"4. We watch with gratitude the endeavors of President Eisenhower and of the Members of both congressional Houses to stop the Red aggression and to support the strivings for freedom of the nations enslaved by Red Moscow.

"5. We state that in the psychological war against Red Moscow and against international communism our endeavors to spread the truth among nations under the Russian physical or moral occupation should be intensified.

"6. We are of the opinion that we should use all means possible to enlighten America and other nations of the free world about the genuine nature of the Russian imperialism, about communism, as well as about their methods. We regard, therefore, the so-called cultural interchange with Moscow in the present form to be false and harmful, because it gives Moscow a convenient disguised chance to spread Communist propaganda in the United States.

"7. We declare that the present so-called government of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic is only a branch of the Moscow center in Ukraine whose task is only to destroy Ukraine materially and morally and to build up the imperialist resources of Red Moscow. Outside of Ukraine, abroad, this so-called government tries to neutralize the liberation-actions of the Ukrainians in the free world.

"8. We send our friendly greetings to all the nations enslaved by Red Moscow and we wish them success in their fight for freedom.

"9. We are convinced that only the dismemberment of the Red Russian empire and the reestablishment of the independent nations for all the peoples enslaved by Russia today can bring a lasting peace in the world.

"10. We demand a resolution in the United Nations Organization condemning Red Moscow as an aggressor of all the nations enslaved by Red Moscow and branding Moscow for the genocide, for the deliberately caused famine, for mass deportations of the mentioned peoples, as well as for the Russian concentration camps."

For the committee:

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE REED, OF NEW YORK

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, Congressman Dan Reed, of New York, was as well known to most of us as he was to his colleagues in the House. All of us who knew him certainly deeply mourn his passing.

All who knew him knew that he was a man of integrity. He was a man of high honor. He was a gentleman in every sense of the word. He was a loyal and true American.

I have heard Dan Reed called the King of the Rugged Individuals, and I can think of no better title for him. He was always concerned with the welfare of this Nation and cautious about some of the programs which he felt deviated from the pattern which our country should follow.

His work on the Ways and Means Committee of the House constituted trojan service for the welfare of our Nation. During his 42 years of service, he made substantial and lasting contributions to our national life and welfare.

When I first came to Congress, I knew about Dan Reed and about his rugged philosophy of government. I heard his praises sung by a great and good friend of mine from South Dakota, Charlie Christopherson, a former Member of the House. I learned to know Dan Reed well and to admire him greatly during my 10 years in the House of Representatives, and found that everything that Charlie Christopherson had told me about his integrity and about his strength of character and about his keen sense of character was certainly verified by my own experience with Dan Reed.

Charlie Christopherson and Dan Reed were men cast from the same mold. They were big men—physically, morally, and spiritually. They had the same philosophy of government. They were good friends and visited back and forth in each other's home during times when Congress was not in session. They worked for the best interests of our country. I feel that I knew Dan Reed well because I knew Charlie Christopherson so well. They were both like giant trees, and when they fell they left a vacant place against the sky.

I wish to extend my sincere sympathy to Mrs. Reed and to William Reed, who is a friend of all of us, who knew him as a former employee of the Senate. They can be comforted in the fact that Dan Reed, the husband and father, contributed so much that was good and so much that was lasting to the country he faithfully served for over 40 years.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I did not have an opportunity to serve in the House of Representatives with the Honorable Dan Reed, but I did have an opportunity to know him and to talk with him on many occasions.

I first heard of him from a friend, John M. Robsion, who was my Congressman, representing the congressional district in Kentucky in which I lived. They had been friends for a long time, and they were both Republicans. They shared many convictions, and they were great patriots.

Congressman Robsion had told me about Congressman Reed, his friend. I came to know him when I first came here. Like others who have spoken and those who knew him, I came to admire his strength of character, his strong convictions, his great ability, and his patriotism. He was always thoughtful, kind, and helpful to me.

We knew his son, Bill Reed, who served as an employee in the Senate.

I should like to join with others in extending to Mrs. Reed and the family our sympathy.

USE OF RUSSIAN IMPORTED EQUIPMENT IN AMERICAN SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, recently I have observed that there have been imported into this country from the Soviet Union various types of equipment, such as microscopes and electronic equipment, designed especially for the use of laboratories in schools and colleges. I understand that a good many thousands of pieces of this equipment are going into stock in this country, and the interesting point about this is that it can be sold for one-third or one-fourth of the cost of producing it in the United States. I do not say that at those prices the equipment constitutes a plan or a scheme; but it is rather interesting that it should be going to schools and colleges in the United States, because the equipment itself has a tremendously large propaganda value.

Mr. President, I have prepared a statement on this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DIRKSEN

Recently it has come to my attention that there have been imported into this country from the Soviet Union various types of equipment such as microscopes, projectors, electronic demonstrating equipment, which is available for use in schools and colleges in this country.

Some of this equipment was exhibited at various conventions in New York and I am advised that it is alleged to be comparable with equipment manufactured in the United States and sells for only one-third or one-fourth of the United States price.

It has been attracting a great deal of attention and it is fair to assume that the importers are now awaiting orders. It appears that a substantial stockpile has been accumulated and that additional equipment is available from the same sources in the Soviet Union.

This presents a very interesting situation. This equipment is not sent here to be sold at a profit, because at the prices at which it is offered according to reports, it could hardly yield a profit even though labor in Russia is not free and businesses pay no taxes because the tax collector really owns the business.

It would be easy, indeed, to use equipment intended for schools and colleges as part of a plan to convince people here at home that Russian equipment is better, her teaching methods are superior, and that she has so much apparatus of this type as to be supplying this country out of surplus. This would be an ideal project as a propaganda weapon.

Of course this is not the first time the Soviet Union has attempted to penetrate commodity and equipment markets because her forage in dropping the price of aluminum is so well known both here and in Canada. This whole matter presents something of a challenge in the space age. I would find no comfort if students and technicians were to say that our physical and electronic equipment is either not good enough or too costly and therefore we must turn to the Soviet Union for the apparatus with which to teach and educate the formative minds of our own country. This situation can produce some very awkward results and especially so in the case of public schools and institutions where public funds would be utilized for the purchase of such equipment. It is a matter that merits careful investigation because of the many implications which might be involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE INDIVIDUAL SENATOR: ITS DISINTEGRATION—PART I, THE CAUCUS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this is the first in a series of speeches I intend to give on the floor of the Senate to protest the disintegration of the rights for all Senators in my party regardless of seniority or official position to take part in determining the most important decisions made in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, what I am about to say I ask the Official Reporters to take down verbatim. In the event another Senator shall invoke rule XIX, paragraph 2, to call me to order, I want to be sure that, in accordance with paragraph 5, rule XIX, I may have the exact words I uttered read to the Senate before the motion on my compliance with or violation of paragraph 2 of rule XIX is voted upon.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Insofar as I am concerned, I wish to assure the Senator from Wisconsin that there will be no invoking of the rule. It is my hope and expectation that the Senator will be allowed to complete his speech without any interruption of that nature.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Montana. I appreciate his remarks very much. I do wish, however, to clarify my statement in the written text, because in what I am about to say I intend no reflection whatsoever upon the conduct or motive of any Senator.

Senators have been confronted with a situation in this body that is not a reflection on their conduct or a consequence of their conduct. On the contrary, it is a reflection of the failure of all of us to act. This, and only this, is what I mean when I say that the typical Democratic Senator has literally nothing to do with determining the legislative program and policies of this party in the Senate.

Democratic Senators have done more than surrender a vital right. We have given up a duty to use the great office of U.S. Senator to its fullest in behalf of our sovereign States and our shared obligation to the national interest.

Today I shall talk about how the total disappearance of the Democratic Party caucus as an instrument of decision or even information has contributed to this situation. In later talks I shall discuss the effect of this surrender of right and duty on the role of our Democratic Policy Committee. I shall also discuss the consequences to the interests of the States themselves. Later I shall talk about how this evaporation of individual senatorial responsibility offends the obligations of this body to the party on whose platform we have run for election. I will also talk about the effect of this situation on the vital function of the Senate as a great deliberative body. Finally, I shall discuss how this has concentrated a unique degree of power in the hands of the majority leader, and I shall examine in detail the full implications of this concentration of power.

Mr. President, I know it will be said that party matters of this kind should be discussed only in party circles—privately, behind closed doors. There are two reasons why I have decided to make this a public discussion. First, I think this is very much the public's business. With my party the overwhelmingly dominant force in this powerful body, the public has a right to sit in on a full critical discussion of who exercises this power, how, and why.

Frankly, I have not discussed these proposals with the leadership, although I have been told by colleagues that they have tried this in the past with uniformly discouraging results. Also I am reminded of a Herblock cartoon showing a happy, smiling and hungry lion, labeled "Congressional leaders," leading into the lion's cave a Congressman carrying a banner labeled "reform." The caption on the cartoon is "Step into my office, lad, and tell me all about it." The floor of the cave is littered with the bareboned skeletons of previous Congressmen who have followed the suggestion of this happy lion.

Secondly, there is a very practical reason why I have taken this issue to the floor of the Senate. There is no other place where I can take it. The Democratic conference or caucus of the Senate is in fact dead—as I shall show shortly.

It will be said also that this kind of public talks on the floor of the Senate itself will accomplish no good, and may do serious harm; that it is foolish and useless.

Mr. President, I disagree, and there is precedent to support my position. I think I can show in the course of the speeches I shall make that there has never been a time when power has been as sharply concentrated as it is today in the Senate. But a similar problem of power concentration has confronted Senators in the past. The first step to its solution has been to talk about it: To pull it out in the cleansing scrutiny of public debate and national consideration. Before I am through I hope to point the way toward at least some modest reforms. And I honestly hope to achieve at least a beginning.

THE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

Here lies the Democratic caucus
Conceived by senatorial responsibility
And born with the Democratic Party—1800
Assassinated at the hand of senatorial indifferences—1953
"She labored faithfully and well to make Senatorial leadership responsible to all the people."

VITAL ROLE OF CAUCUS

Mr. President, there is one body and only one body to which all Democratic Senators and only Democratic Senators belong. That is the Democratic conference—in past years called the Democratic caucus. This is the fountainhead of Democratic power in the Senate. The policy committee, the steering committee, the chairmen of all committees, the party whip, and, yes, the majority leader himself, all owe their offices to this convocation of all Democratic Senators, which also directs the assignment of Democratic members to all committees. During much of the history of the Senate the party conference or caucus has given all Democratic Senators their opportunity to exercise their right and fulfill their duty in determining our party's program and policies.

Mr. President, what has happened to that opportunity?

I took office in this body on August 29, 1957. Since that time the Democratic Party has had exactly two senatorial conferences or caucuses. The first was the first week in January 1958. This was the first Democratic Party caucus in this body for 1 full year. The second took place just last month. So this party in the Senate has been moving along at the rate of one conference or caucus a year. What caucuses! The caucus is not only immensely important, it offers the one and only opportunity for most of us as Democratic Senators to have a word to say about our Democratic program, the legislation this majority Democratic Party of ours will take up during the session.

What happened at these vital annual meetings? Let me describe them.

JANUARY 1958 DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

In January of 1958 Senators assembled and listened to the majority leader read a speech which he had previously released to the press in full. After the speech the two Senators elected since the last previous meeting of the caucus—including myself—were introduced. Then four or five Senators were called on by the leader to discuss the Nation's defense posture; and the meeting adjourned. That was it.

That was the sum total of meetings of Democratic Senators in conference during all of 1958.

There was not a single matter of party business discussed. There was not even a mention of party program, not a whisper concerning any legislation. There was no provision on the agenda for such discussion. This was the sum total of opportunities for most Democratic Senators to influence the most important decisions made in this body during all of last year.

JANUARY 1959, DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

The next meeting of the Senate Democratic caucus was a full year later. It took place just last month. Again the meeting was convened by the majority leader, who delivered another speech on the state of the Nation. This speech, too, had been released beforehand in full to the press. After the leader's speech, the only real caucus business that has transpired since I took office in 1957 then took place. The President pro tempore was renominated. The President pro tempore then declared that the majority leader, his assistant, and the secretary of the conference, had done a fine job last year, and without objection were elected again. The business of the caucus was over. The only business of the entire caucus had taken less than 2½ minutes. And Senators had surrendered for another year their right and duty to determine the Democratic Party's policies and program. There was a later speech by Senator HUMPHREY on his interview with Khrushchev, but there was no significant further consideration of party business, and no information on the party's program or policies before the caucus adjourned.

By the simple declaration of those few seconds, 63 Democratic Senators had elected a 64th Senator, as majority leader. The same leader became automatically chairman of the party's steering committee that determined all committee assignments. He was given the power to appoint all other members of the steering committee. He also became chairman of the policy committee, which schedules the legislative program. He was given the power to appoint all members of the policy committee. These powers have, of course, inhered for some time in the office of Democratic majority leader. But, as I shall show, there is a clear and sharp difference in the quality of this power now, a difference not simply in degree, but a difference in kind.

LA FOLLETTE PRECEDENT

My predecessor, the great Senator Bob La Follette, in opposing power concentration in the Senate 50 years ago, encountered a strikingly similar situation. Let me quote from the statement La Follette made on the floor after a similar caucus. This was a conference of the Republican Party, instead of the Democratic Party:

> I attended a caucus at the beginning of this Congress. I happened to look at my watch when we went into that caucus. We were in session 3 minutes and a half. Do you know what happened? Well, I will tell you. A motion was made that somebody preside. Then a motion was made that whoever presided should appoint a committee on committees; and a motion was then made that we adjourn. Nobody said anything but the Senator who made the motion. Then and there the fate of all the legislation of this session was decided. * * * Mr. President, if you will scan the committees of this Senate, you will find that a little handful of men are in domination and control of the great legislative committees of this body, and that they are a very limited number.

That statement was made by Senator La Follette 50 years ago.

TO WHOM IS MAJORITY LEADER NOW RESPONSIBLE?

Now, Mr. President, we come to the crux of our problem. Let me ask: With the collapse of the Democratic caucus as an instrument of decision, to whom is the majority leader responsible for his discharge of the immense powers with which the caucus in an instant endowed him for 2 full years?

Let me ask that question again: With the collapse of the Democratic caucus as an instrument of decision, to whom is the majority leader responsible for his discharge of the immense powers with which the caucus in an instant endowed him for 2 full years?

The truth is, in the final analysis, that the majority leader is, under the conditions of the present, ultimately responsible only to the electors of his own State, just as any other Senator is. Because this is so, the citizens of all the other States are in effect disenfranchised to a very substantial extent in the decisions that are exercised by the majority leader. The only way in which citizens of the other States can be assured of representation in the making of these decisions is to have their Senators participate in the making of the decisions. The decisions now being made by the majority leader must instead be made by the majority in the Senate through the instrument of an active and functioning majority caucus.

Before 1955, every Democratic majority leader had been responsible, at least in large part, to a Democratic President all the way back to 1880, when the Democratic caucus had been flourishing vigorously.

I call attention to the fact that this is a part of the difference in kind between the situation up until 1955 and the situation from 1955 until today, because when the majority leader is responsible to the President of the United States, there is an enormous difference between such a responsibility and that of a majority leader who is not responsible to anyone.

Because the President is nationally elected by a national party, with a national platform and program, the majority leader was responsible in a national sense. This responsibility has not been just a matter of academic theory. It has been a tough, practical fact of political life. The majority leader conferred with the President, reported to the President, and was the President's representative in the Senate. Of course, events like the resignation of Alben Barkley from the majority leadership when he disagreed with the President emphasized and underlined this relationship. The almost perfect cooperation between Majority Leader John Kern and Woodrow Wilson and an active and vigorous Democratic caucus from 1913 through 1916 was probably the classic expression of the responsibility.

I think Senators can hardly do better than go back to the period from 1913 to 1916 and consider how the Democratic majority operated; and it was a thin majority at that time. It was a majority which did not have the vast superiority we now have, a superiority, virtually, of two to one. The majority at that time was very close. It was also a majority having dissident groups, just as ours has, perhaps more so.

The majority of that time was a majority confronted with a tremendously difficult situation, including a change in the Presidency. But it was a majority which fulfilled its responsibility by passing some of the most significant legislation this Nation has ever seen. The entire New Freedom program of President Wilson was passed in the period from 1913 to 1916. There were not occasional caucuses; there were frequent caucuses. The Democratic Senators operated as a unit. The Democratic leader, John Kern, who was a splendid majority leader, took his direction from the unified decision of all Democratic Senators. But the fact is that throughout the history of this body up through 1954, the Democratic majority leader was always responsible either to an alert and active caucus, to a Democratic President, or both. Again I ask: To whom is the office of majority leader responsible now? With nearly a two-thirds control of the Senate by my party, this becomes a critical national question. This is not merely the business of our party; it is the business of the American people. With almost a two-thirds control of the Senate, the Democratic Party has tremendous power and a very great responsibility, a responsibility which should be definite, and definitely understood by the American people, by Democratic Senators and by the majority leader.

INDIVIDUAL SENATORIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Does the failure of Senators to insist on intervening by formally and publicly requesting a caucus mean that by our inaction we acquiesce in whatever our leadership may develop as a plan or program?

It is true of course that the caucus can be and I am sure would be convened to exercise direction and control over the majority leader at any time Senators requested such action. This was dramatically demonstrated to me when I started writing this speech on Friday. I asked them to see the minutes of past conferences or caucuses. I asked to see them as a member of the conference, thinking I could see them at any time. I was told that the majority leader felt that he needed the authority of the caucus to permit me, though a member of the caucus, to see them. He offered to call a meeting of the conference at once for this purpose alone if I so requested.

I want to make it clear that this was not in a direct conversation with the majority leader; it was indirect, through persons acting for him.

Such a meeting could be called. But of course this is never done. It is generally regarded as a leadership prerogative to call a conference. This is not simply because the action by nonleadership Senators might be regarded as a rude intrusion or an affront to the leadership. It is also because only the leadership is in a position to lay out comprehensive, timely, and appropriate agenda for discussion. And, of course, the proof of the pudding is in the eating: While any Senator could request the leadership to call a conference, what do the facts show? As a matter of established fact, it never happens.

CAUCUSES SELDOM MEET

In the 85th Congress the Democratic caucus, as I have pointed out, met exactly twice during its 2-year life. Both times the leadership convened it. This was also true of the 84th Congress in its 2 years and of the 83d before that. According to all reports the meetings were as perfunctory and as totally unrelated to a party program as the meetings I have described. For some years prior to 1952 the meetings of the caucus were convened infrequently, though more often than once each year. I find, for example, press notices of 13 Democratic caucuses in the 81st Congress, only 7 during the 2-year life of the 80th, and 7 during the 2-year life of the 82d.

POLITICAL SCIENTISTS FAVOR FREQUENT CAUCUSES CALLED BY LEADERSHIP

Mr. President, what is perhaps the most authoritative statement by outstanding professional experts on this subject was made by the committee on political parties of the American Political Science Association in a report in 1950 entitled "Towards a More Responsible Two-Party System." In a recommendation to Congress these top political scientists recommend:

> Whether they be called caucuses or conferences, more frequent meetings of the party membership in each House should be held. Otherwise there can be no real discussion of party positions and no real participation in or check upon the decisions of the party leadership. Without such discussion and participation, efforts to make party operations more responsible will be futile.

Mr. President, let me repeat that quotation, because I believe it is extremely important that the Democratic Members of the Senate recognize that the words I have quoted are the considered judgment of the top political scientists:

> Whether they be called caucuses or conferences, more frequent meetings of the party membership in each House should be held. Otherwise there can be no real discussion of party positions and no real participation in or check upon the decisions of the party leadership. Without such discussion and participation, efforts to make party operations more responsible will be futile.

So said those top scientists.

Mr. President, although those words are the most recent authoritative ones on this subject that have been spoken by the members of the American Political Science Association, I think it interesting to recall that they were spoken in 1950. The association's committee then called for more frequent caucuses. But what has happened since then? As I have pointed out, we have been going along with one caucus a year, and it has had nothing to do with the program or the policies of our party.

Mr. President, should any Senator who feels so inclined be responsible for initiating these caucuses? Well, these authorities recommended that "the party leadership committees should be responsible for calling more frequent caucuses"; and then they added, Mr. President, "and developing the agenda of points for discussion."

Mr. President, if any Senator who felt like doing so were to convene a caucus, it is obvious that there would be chaos. There would not be the right kind of organization for a caucus. It would not be possible for any such Senator to schedule the consideration of pertinent proposed legislation; and, obviously, it would be a rude intrusion upon the prerogatives of the leadership; and, clearly, it would not get anywhere, because in such a caucus the sentiment would obviously be opposed to any Senator who might be so impertinent as to call such a caucus.

Mr. President, I think the authors of the report from which I have quoted deserve recognition, because all of them were eminent professors from our leading universities, specifically: Thomas S. Barclay, Stanford University; Clarence A. Berdahl, University of Illinois; Hugh A. Bone, University of Washington; Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland; Paul T. David, Brookings Institution; Merle Fainsod, Harvard University; Bertram M. Gross, Council of Economic Advisers; E. Allen Helms, Ohio State University; E. M. Kirkpatrick, Department of State; John W. Lederle, University of Michigan; Fritz Morstein Marx, American University; Louise Overacker, Wellesley College; Howard Penniman, Department of State; Kirk H. Porter, State University of Iowa; J. B. Shannon, University of Kentucky; and E. E. Schattschneider, Wesleyan University, chairman.

PRESIDENT WILSON WARMLY PRAISED CAUCUS

Mr. President, Woodrow Wilson more than 70 years ago, in his great "Constitutional Government," warmly praised the caucus as a vital "antidote to the committees—designed to supply the cohesive principle which the multiplicity and mutual independence of the committees so powerfully tend to destroy. The caucus is the drilling round of the party. There its discipline is renewed and strengthened, its uniformity of step and gesture regained. The voting and speaking in the House are generally merely the movements of a sort of dress parade, for which the exercises of caucus are designed to prepare. It is easy to see how difficult it would be for the party to keep its head amidst the confused cross movements of the committees without thus now and again pulling itself together in caucus, where it can ask itself its own mind, and pledge itself anew to eternal agreement."

Mr. President, I ask no such eternal agreement or discipline. Of course I recognize that it would probably be impossible, and very likely unwise if it were possible, to impose a caucus unit rule in this body even on matters of first importance in our party platform. I am not asking for that, or even for a consideration of it.

What I am asking for is that our leadership consider in due time calling regular caucuses with specific agendas proposing consideration of our legislative program. At least to begin with, I do not ask for more than a report by our leadership on what they plan for this body, and why. I ask an opportunity for all Members to express their viewpoint, and I ask that the caucus vote on important controversial issues, not to bind anyone, but for the guidance of our leadership.

INDIVIDUAL CONSCIENCE MUST NOT BE BOUND

It will be said that the party record is made by the votes of individual Senators, responsible only to their own conscience and to the electors of their States, free from direction by the party leaders in the Senate. That is all to the good and as it should be, as far as it goes. But what this overlooks is that, as a practical matter, an extremely vital element of decision is made on each item of legislation and on the general legislative program long before the individual Senators are given an opportunity to vote on the floor of the Senate. It is in this area of decision, before legislation reaches the floor for action, that the majority leader exercises his greatest power. It is in this area that the decision is made, to an extremely significant extent, as to what the practical alternatives will be upon which individual Senators can vote. The decisions that are made in this domain are vitally important to the Nation.

It is my objective to obtain for the individual Senator the opportunity to have an effective voice in the making of the extremely important, vital decisions that occur before legislation can reach the floor of the Senate for action, and to have a voice also in determining what legislation shall reach the floor for a vote.

I want to emphasize my deep conviction that the primary, fundamental responsibility of an elected representative must be to his own conscience. No consideration—whether of party interest or popular pressure—must ever override the judgment of an elected official's own conscience as to what is best for his State and his Nation. From the very beginning of my career in politics and government, I have never hesitated to follow the dictates of my conscience, although to do so has often brought me into sharp disagreement and conflict with members of my own party, as well as important groups among my friends and supporters. This principle I fully intend to follow absolutely. No party leader, no special interest group, however powerful, no consideration of personal friendship and association, will I ever allow to take primacy over my own conscience in determining how I shall vote or otherwise carry out the duties of any office that I might hold.

This principle of the absolute primacy of individual conscience in no way conflicts with the objective I am seeking now—to make the majority party caucus into a truly effective and representative agency of the will of the majority in the Senate. As a matter of fact, this principle would be reinforced greatly thereby; my present action is completely in accordance with my deepest belief that the individual conscience of each Senator must be supreme in guiding his official action. I seek to broaden the opportunity of every individual Senator to make his own voice heard when the big decisions are made in the Senate as to what will or what will not be done about the public's business. In no way do I mean to imply or to suggest that this would entail submission of the individual Senator's conscience to the will of the majority of the caucus. I will follow the dictates of my conscience against the decision of a caucus as readily as a decision of any leader, if I believe my course to be right and theirs wrong.

Mr. President, I come now to a subject which I know troubles many Senators, and I know it troubles many other American citizens, because the Senate has an unusual and a remarkable majority leader.

Mr. President, our party in the Senate enjoys a leader who has been more extravagantly and widely praised by his colleagues and the press throughout this country than any other leader who has graced this body. There is no man in America today who has been more widely credited with vigorous and positive leadership than has he. Most consider this leadership an important national asset. Heaven knows that in this day the American people need and want leadership.

In a later speech I shall discuss the full implications of this leadership and the power it has generated. But for the purpose of my speech today, I can see no reason why regular caucuses to provide a systematic and comprehensive briefing of all Democratic Senators by the leadership, with at least some guidance by the membership, should impede the drive and the accomplishment of the leadership. In fact, I honestly think, and bluntly say, it will improve the leadership. Without such a caucus we as Democratic Senators have immensely stepped up the horsepower and speed of this new streamlined Senate automobile, but we have tossed away the roadmap so that we are never sure where we are being taken.

Certainly in these perilous times, our Nation gravely needs strong and effective leadership. But even more important is the need that leadership be truly representative of the majority in the Nation, and that it be truly responsible to the people. These needs can be served only by an agency that is directly responsible to the people. The President of the United States is responsible to the national majority which elects him. The majority in the Senate is generally responsible also to a majority of the Nation. But the majority leader, under present conditions, is not. The only way that office of majority leader can be made relatively responsible to the people of the entire Nation is to make it directly and effectively responsible to the majority in the Senate, by assuring to each Senator a full opportunity to participate in making the important decisions now vested in the majority leader.

This will not weaken the leadership function which can be supplied to the Nation in the Senate. On the contrary, it will improve and strengthen it by transforming it into a more genuinely representative national leadership, instead of allowing this great power to exist without the effective sanction of the Senators who represent the other States and their people.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I have been listening with interest to the very able speech being delivered by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. I should like to ask him when he arrived at his conclusion regarding the adverse impact on the public welfare of the policies followed by the majority leader.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In reply to the distinguished Senator from Oregon, I should like to say that he puts words into my mouth. I do not think he will find anything in my speech to indicate that I think the policies of the majority leader have necessarily been adverse to and against the public interest. I shall come to that subject later. I have a speech which I intend to deliver on the consequences of this power. I think that there are certain decisions which perhaps might have been wiser. I think there have been certain decisions which have not been made which should have been made.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Let us not quibble about words. When did the Senator from Wisconsin decide to rise on the floor of the Senate and criticize the majority leader? I would be interested to learn the chronology of when the Senator from Wisconsin arrived at that decision.

Mr. PROXMIRE. These decisions are decisions which the Senator from Wisconsin has made over a substantial period of time. I think I began to feel uncomfortable about the situation at the very first caucus I attended. It began to appear to me that this was a situation which needed action—demanded action.

Mr. NEUBERGER. As I recall, the first caucus which the Senator from Wisconsin attended was in January 1958. Is that correct? That is my memory of it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I will tell the Senator why I am asking these questions. Unless my memory fails me, the Senator from Wisconsin, during that portion of his career before his election to a 6-year term, probably "buttered up" the majority leader more than any other Senator of the then 96 Members of this body. That is why I asked about the chronology, because I could not believe my eyes when a copy of the speech was delivered to me. Bells began to ring in my memory. I remembered tributes paid by the Senator from Wisconsin, after January 1958, to LYNDON JOHNSON that actually only would be applied to George Washington, who was memorialized earlier today by the able Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] when he read the great Farewell Address.

I should like to ask the Senator a few questions——

Mr. PROXMIRE. May I reply to the first allegation now? I will say to the Senator from Oregon, that of course I praised the majority leader. I praised him when I thought he was right, and he often was. As I have just said in the speech I am delivering now, the drive, the emphasis, the initiative, and the effectual conduct of leadership of the majority leader has been a national asset. I think it will continue to be a national asset. I intend to continue to rise on the floor of the Senate and say I think he is right when I think he is right. I will also rise on the Senate floor and say the majority leader is wrong when I think he is wrong.

However, I should like to have an opportunity to reply to my good friend, and to point out that the words "buttered up"—[laughter]—have certain implications which I think are not warranted.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Let me say "lavishly praised."

Mr. PROXMIRE. I lavishly praised the Senator from Texas.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Let us say "glowingly lauded." I will read some of the tributes in just a moment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am delighted the Senator from Oregon is going to read them. I think it will serve an excellent purpose if he does read them, because I want to put in its proper perspective the criticism I am making. The proper perspective is that the Senator from Wisconsin has a right to speak out when he thinks the majority leader in his action and leadership should have direction and should have control by the Senators who gave him his power.

Mr. NEUBERGER. The reason I inquired about the chronology of the Senator's decision is the fact that it does amaze me that the Senator should have, a year ago, more than did any other Senator, glowingly praised and lavishly lauded and widely heralded—if those terms are acceptable—the majority leader of the Senate, and has now become such a vigorous critic of the majority leader.

For example, on April 1, 1958, the Senator from Wisconsin said, under the headline "A Strong Leader in the Senate," as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 5, page 5891:

> Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Milwaukee Journal, in my home State of Wisconsin, recently carried an editorial tribute to the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], our majority leader.

Then the Senator from Wisconsin went on to praise the Milwaukee Journal. I concur in the praise of that great newspaper. Then the Senator went on and read from the Milwaukee Journal as follows:

> The United States is getting little leadership from the White House. Fortunately, Congress is trying to fill the vacuum. Guiding the effort is LYNDON B. JOHNSON, remarkable Democratic leader in the Senate. * * * The driving Texan has given Congress direction and a sense of urgency.

Then the Senator from Wisconsin said:

> The editorial concludes with the central reason for the enormous contribution the majority leader is making to our country when it says:

"He thinks the best way he can serve his country is as a responsible leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate."

I shall not read all the editorial.

Then I notice other tributes to Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, of Texas, which were made on February 28, 1958. I call attention to the fact that these dates are following the time when the Senator from Wisconsin said he first became disturbed about conduct of the party caucus by the majority leader. An article appearing in Harper's magazine by Mr. William S. White, entitled "Who Is LYNDON JOHNSON?" was being discussed. The Senator from Wisconsin, as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 3, page 3089, said:

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have read the very fine article by William S. White. I concur wholeheartedly in the remarks of the Senator from Montana—

That was Senator MANSFIELD.

I should like to add that this article is particularly important to the Senate, because it sets forth what our distinguished majority leader has done. He has occupied a very difficult role. It is never so heroic, never so flamboyant, never so appealing as that of the arch-crusader. It is a role of moderation, a role of outstanding responsibility. If the American people can have this article called to their attention they will understand that portion of the title which reads, "An Intimate Report on the Second Most Powerful Man in America." They will understand the great opportunity which Congress finds it has in this session to exert a kind of congressional leadership which the Nation has never seen. That is possible because of the outstanding ability of our distinguished majority leader.

My reason for raising this point is that it does seem to me that to accept what emoluments and benefits the majority leader could confer, and then to turn on him, after being elected to a 6-year term, certainly should be called to the attention of the Senate.

I have done this only because I was personally involved in an episode which the Senator from Wisconsin may remember. A vacancy occurred on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I had applied a great length of time earlier, perhaps over a year earlier, for a seat on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. When the vacancy occurred, I had a priority for the seat.

The majority leader sought me out, and he said to me, "BILL PROXMIRE has reported that if he can only get on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, because of the dairying and farming situation in his State, his reelection is assured." He said, "I hope that you will see fit to bypass this vacancy, to which you are entitled."

I am trying to paraphrase as accurately as I can the majority leader in his conversation with me. He said, "I hope you will bypass this vacancy, to which you are entitled, having requested it earlier, and by seniority, so that Senator PROXMIRE can go on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and thus strengthen his position and prestige with the people in the great dairying State of Wisconsin."

I abdicated my chance to get on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. In all truthfulness, I must say I did not do it solely because the majority leader spoke to me. I did it because I would have had to relinquish my position on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and the people of my own State had several very vital matters pending before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, particularly the crisis regarding the future of the great pine forest on the Klamath Indian Reservation. I felt I had to remain on the Interior Committee, and I have no regrets about the decision.

The point I am making is that, in the year 1958, the Senator from Wisconsin filled the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with praise of the majority leader. I am not going to read all of the remarks, because there are many examples, and my legislative assistant, Mr. Lawrence Hobart, has had only 20 minutes to try to obtain these example from the library upstairs. I am sure we could cover these desks from end to end with material, if my memory is correct.

In 1958 the Senator from Wisconsin filled the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with more praise of LYNDON JOHNSON than any other Member of the Senate, if my memory is correct. The Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] actually went to another Member of the Senate; namely, the junior Senator from Oregon, and asked him to relinquish an opportunity to become a member of a great Senate committee so that the Senator from Wisconsin could fill that vacancy and that position which was so important to the great agricultural State that the Senator helps to represent in the Senate.

I simply say, if the Senator is correct in telling the Senate that he began to be disturbed about the situation in January of 1958, I wonder why the Senator repeatedly put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD such extensive and lavish and glowing praise of the majority leader and his policies between then and the time the Congress adjourned prior to the Senator's reelection in 1958?

I want to say also that I do not wholly disagree with everything the Senator is saying today, but I think a man should whistle the same tune all the time. Many of the things the Senator is saying have a good deal of truth in them, although I am disturbed about the word "discipline" which has been applied to a party caucus in some of the Senator's statements.

I want to say that if all of the members of the Democratic caucus, meeting as the Senator suggests, decide we should spend $4.8 billion to subsidize a small portion of the farmers, I am not going to vote that way unless somebody holds my hand in an acetylene torch.

I do not wholly disagree with the Senator's statements, but I am amazed and surprised after all of the praise of the majority leader in 1958, to observe that now the Senator, so relatively soon thereafter, is making the speech the able Senator from Wisconsin is delivering today.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I reply to the Senator from Oregon that this is one of the most astonishing arguments I have ever heard. The position of the Senator from Oregon is that because I have praised the senior Senator from Texas in the past—apparently because I have praised him often and because I have praised him whenever I have thought he has done well, which was quite frequent—I should therefore not criticize him when I feel he should be criticized.

I shall be through shortly, but I have several points to make in answer to the long question asked me by my colleague from Oregon.

The position of the Senator from Oregon apparently is that once one praises a Senator and once one says a Senator is doing a good job, if the Senator does things which are wrong in the future, if the Senator makes mistakes in the future, or if one disagrees with the Senator in the future, one is forever after that in a position where he must not be critical, but has to go along with the Senator.

I think that we all recognize Emerson had a principle, whether he was right or wrong, when he said, "consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds."

Mr. NEUBERGER. "A foolish consistency."

Mr. PROXMIRE. Very well; "A foolish consistency."

I think it would be a foolish consistency indeed to feel that because I have praised the majority leader in the past I cannot criticize him now.

What the Senator from Oregon is saying, it seems to me, puts the finger on something I am going to bring up with emphasis in a later speech, and also emphasizes what is implicit in what I am saying today, namely, that because we have a majority leader doing a good job in many respects and because we have a majority leader whom we can praise often, we are in a position, apparently, where we must follow him wherever he leads and, furthermore, we cannot step in to use the caucus which has been used traditionally by Senators—particularly Democratic Senators—to guide and direct their leadership.

Furthermore I should like to make this point: The Senator has argued that because I accepted emoluments offered to me by LYNDON JOHNSON I should not criticize. This is exactly the point. I think the majority leader is a good majority leader. If I am assigned to a committee, am I obligated to LYNDON JOHNSON? Almost every Senator—well, every Senator on the Democratic side—has good committee assignments, including myself. I am happy to have them. I think it will be a sorry day in the U.S. Senate when 63 Democratic Senators feel that because the majority leader is the majority leader and because they received good committee assignments they are therefore, from now on, obligated to him, whether he is right or wrong.

It seems to me this is the kind of control and this is the kind of direction which is insidious and which can prevent Senators from being totally and completely unrestricted in representing their States and the Nation according to conscience and best judgment.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. NEUBERGER. The Senator used the phrase "in the future" when he discussed his attitude toward LYNDON JOHNSON. The point I am making is that, according to the Senator's own manuscript, and oral remarks made later, the Senator said he became disturbed about the caucus situation in January of 1958, yet most of his extensive praise of the majority leader took place after that time.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Well, unlike the Senator from Oregon and perhaps other extremely brilliant Senators, I move rather slowly on these things. It takes a long time, with a lot of experience and a lot of time having to intervene and a lot of incidents having to develop, before I can see the pattern which exists in the Senate. I suspected it. I felt it, at the same time I was swept along in a tide with a lot of other fine Democratic Senators who felt overwhelmed. The fact is that we had a vigorous and effective majority leader, giving very effective leadership to the Senate at a time when the American people needed and wanted leadership. I think that is true

Mr. NEUBERGER. Was the Senator swept along to say, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> Mr. President, few men of his time can match the record of leadership of the senior Senator from Texas.

Was the Senator swept along in that manner? Who swept the Senator along to say—and again I repeat—the most extensive, lavish, and glowing praise which the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] received from any Member of the Senate during 1958? Such was the praise the Senator from Texas received from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Oregon——

Mr. NEUBERGER. The Senator was not swept along to do that.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Oregon has not made an analysis of the remarks regarding the distinguished senior Senator from Texas by all other Senators, I am sure. There were many statements and speeches of warm praise for the Senator from Texas. The Senator deserved them. I was present and heard many remarks made.

What I am saying in my prepared speech today is—and I quote: "There is no man in America today who has been more widely credited with vigorous and positive leadership than has he," unquote.

I say, also—quote: "Most consider this leadership an important national asset," unquote.

I say the Senator has been widely praised by his colleagues, and I do not think I am misstating or completely reversing my position, so far as that is concerned. I think the position I have taken has largely been consistent.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Again I say to the Senator from Wisconsin—and I say it with all respect—that I believe the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should show that his very extensive praise of Senator LYNDON JOHNSON occurred in 1958, prior to the election of the Senator from Wisconsin for a full 6-year term in the Senate; and the speech which is being delivered today, and the subsequent speeches critical of the majority leader, which will follow, occurred, or will have occurred, after the reelection of the Senator from Wisconsin for a full 6-year term in the Senate. Yet the Senator from Wisconsin has said—and I believe it is in the RECORD—that he began to be disturbed about this situation back in January 1958.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think it is most unfortunate that the emphasis in this little exchange between the brilliant Senator from Oregon and myself has been upon criticism of the majority leader. Actually, I believe any fair-minded reading of my speech would show that it is a proposal for frequent Democratic caucuses, and an attempt to justify them, together with a plea to the leader to call them. I believe, to the extent that there is criticism of the leadership, it is tempered with recognition that this very able man has greatly contributed to his country. I honor him for that.

My good friend from Oregon has said little or nothing about the merits of my argument.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Let me say one thing, if I may, and then I shall be through.

As I stated earlier, I agree with much of the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin. However, the Senator has asked me to comment on the merits, and I do so briefly.

I think there should be more party caucuses. I wrote an article for the New York Times magazine a year ago in which I questioned the seniority system. I do not recall that I received any support on the floor of the Senate from the Senator from Wisconsin at that time, although a few of my colleagues did support me.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I have often praised the Senator from Oregon. I would have praised him then.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am concerned when the Senator uses the word "discipline" with respect to a party caucus. If a Democratic Party caucus should decide that we should not pay out billions of dollars more for farm price supports for six favored commodities, does the Senator from Wisconsin feel that he would be bound or disciplined by that decision?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I wish the Senator from Oregon had been present during my speech.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I have read it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In at least six different paragraphs I stated that the conscience of the individual Senator must take primacy. Under no circumstances would I consider myself bound by the unit rule in any vote of the caucus. I have stated that the purpose of the caucus was to give guidance to the leadership, and to let the leadership know how the rank and file Democratic Senators feel.

Mr. NEUBERGER. The word "discipline" was used somewhere in the Senator's speech. It is an 11-page speech. Therefore it is possible that he may have taken both sides of the argument.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The word was used in quoting Woodrow Wilson. After I had quoted Woodrow Wilson, I stated that I disagreed with him on that particular point, although I agreed with his general sentiment in expressing a great desire for caucuses, and emphasizing their great benefit.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I should like to see more party caucuses, but I do not want to see a situation in which there is to be rigid discipline, and in which the minority must go along with the majority, whether in connection with farm price supports, public power, taxation, foreign policy, or any other question before the Senate. I think that would be a bad mistake. I believe that then we would have retrogressed, rather than have made the progress which I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin seeks.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Before I yield to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, let me say that while the Senator from Oregon seems to disagree on a few minor aspects, I find that he agrees with me that there should be more party caucuses. He agrees that they should not be binding on individual Members. I am delighted to welcome the Senator to my band. I am gratified that out of this criticism there has developed a real supporter.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am sure that everything that has been said here has been in good humor. It will be recalled that when this colloquy began, the Senator from Oregon used the term "butter." It would have been terrible had he used the term "oleomargarine." [Laughter.]

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for that very sage observation. There is no word more beautiful than "butter."

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he has ever asked for a party conference in which to discuss the question of how the party conference should be handled.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I answer the Senator from Montana by pointing out that I stated in my speech that I had not done so. I have not done so because I feel that that should not be the function of individual Senators. It should be the function of the leadership, and should not be done by individual Senators.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator attended the last caucus or conference of the Democratic Party, last month, did he not?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes; I did.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Does the Senator recall that on that occasion the majority leader asked if any member of the conference had anything to say?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I recall that very well; but I also recall the context in which the question was asked. It was asked after the speech of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and it was my understanding that the question was asked whether any Member present had a question with relation to his speech. That is my best recollection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. We could be looking at the situation from different points of view. It is my understanding—and I could be mistaken, just as the Senator from Wisconsin could be mistaken—that when the majority leader raised the question, it was up to any individual member of the conference to bring up any question he had in his mind. There was only one member of the conference absent, and that was the junior Senator from Oregon. It was up to any individual Senator to bring up any subject he wished to discuss at that time. I think that fact should be brought out for the record.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. It was my impression that the context in which the question was asked last month was that of a suggestion that if any Senator had any matter to bring before the caucus, that was the time to bring it up. As I recall, most of us were anxious to get away from there and go about our business.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Does the Senator recall at what point in the caucus this question was asked? Was it at the end?

Mr. LONG. Yes; it was at the conclusion. But I am sure the Senator would anticipate that when the group is called together, the first thing to be done is to designate a candidate for President pro tempore, and decide who the majority leader should be. Someone must be selected to preside over the conference. After a word or two from those selected for those positions, the next thing in order is unfinished business—for example, any questions arising as a result of investigations during the recess, and things of that sort.

The next item in order is new business. I do not believe any member came there with the expectation that any unfinished business was to be taken up. It was my impression—and I believe the impression of most other Senators—that if any Senator had wished to bring up any particular subject, he had the privilege of bringing it up at that time. Of course, he might have been confronted with a situation which often exists. At that point the meeting room might be virtually deserted, or Senators might be busy and might desire to go somewhere else. It was my impression that any Member could have brought up any question he desired to raise.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Louisiana. I point out that what has been said exactly emphasizes what was wrong with the caucus which was held, and why it is so important that we have agenda determined in advance, so that all members may know the agenda in advance. Members should be solicited for suggestions, or invited to discuss any question they wish to discuss.

The caucus developed in the manner described by the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Montana. After it was over, I have no doubt that the question was asked whether any Senator had anything to bring up. I did not happen to hear that question, but I am sure it was asked.

That is not the atmosphere in which it is possible for our party to develop a legislative program, or for rank-and-file Senators to have anything to say about the legislative program. This agenda for legislative discussion should be a function of the leadership.

What I am calling for is a greater degree of democracy in our party in the Senate. And the first step toward this democracy is regular meetings of our party membership to permit all Senators to know where the leadership intends to take us, and to permit the membership, if it cares to do so, to indicate whether or not it wants to go there.

In a later speech I shall discuss in detail the effect of this surrender of responsibility by Democratic Senators on our obligation to the Democratic Party we represent and its platform. Suffice it to say here that without genuine caucuses there is no way we can exercise the responsibility every Democratic Senator shares to hold our leadership accountable to that platform. And, of course, without a caucus the whole process by which our party's program is rationalized and compromised to fit as well as possible the interests of every section of the country—this process is short circuited. This, too, I shall discuss in detail at a later date. And, Mr. President, without any significant caucuses of our party the policy committee assumes a degree of responsibility that is large and serious. I shall talk about that later also.

PROXMIRE PURPOSE

Mr. President, in conclusion, the junior Senator from Wisconsin was not sent to this body to delegate his authority as a Senator to any other Senator, no matter how able, wise, or good that Senator may be. This Senator is going to continue to call on the leadership to tell him what programs are to be proposed, when they are to be considered, and why. And when the leadership does inform me, I am going to do all I can to recover the traditional power U.S. Senators have had in the past to take part in determining how our leadership should act for our party and country.

I am not as sanguine about this, perhaps, as some may think I am, so I close with a quotation from William the Silent, which indicates my attitude on this entire great question. This is the only quotation that hangs in my office:

> It is not necessary to hope in order to undertake, or to succeed in order to persevere.

Mr. President, before I came on the floor I was puzzled and rather curious to know what kind of reaction there would be to my speech on the part of my colleagues, inasmuch as this is a very difficult speech to give. It is probably even more difficult to listen to. I wish to thank my colleagues for their willingness to give of their time to listen to the speech, and the fact that there are a number of my colleagues on the floor who came to listen to it without being solicited. It was a very hard and difficult speech for me to make.

I wish to thank the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] for his characteristic interest and his great fairness in suggesting that, while he disagreed with me strongly with respect to the timing, the occasion, or some other aspect of the speech, he was fair enough to say that he agrees wholeheartedly with me in its objective.

THE REPUBLICAN CONFERENCE RULES, LEADERSHIP, AND COMMITTEES

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the discussion of mechanics, policies, and procedures in the Senate. First, I wish to say that I have known the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] for 25 years. I consider him to be an able, dedicated, and patriotic American. In the time I have known him—and that goes back almost a quarter of a century—I have always found him to be entirely cooperative. I can say that on behalf of the minority.

But I am not insensible of the fact that the discussion which took place probably brings into sharp perspective a great question which often recurs to the minds of the people, particularly students. After all, students of political science and civics are tremendously interested in Senate procedures. I can speak only for the minority, of course, but I think I ought to make the record clear, first of all, by placing in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, the text of the rules of the Republican conference. This particular issue is dated January 10, 1957. The rules have not been changed since that time, although amendments have been freely offered in the conference.

The rules set forth in some detail the method of the selection of party officials, the creation of the conference and of the policy committee, the duties of the officers, the creation of a campaign committee, and how the conference shall be called.

Actually, there are three ways in which the conference on this side of the aisle can be called: by the chairman; by a vote of the policy committee; or by the request of five Senators, when it shall become mandatory.

As a matter of fact, when the Republican Policy Committee meets weekly, it is actually a meeting of the Republican conference over the luncheon table, at which time we discuss all matters of pending business. Thus, so far as possible, all the information which is within the possession and the command of the leadership is freely diffused to every member.

Mr. President, in connection with these observations, I ask unanimous consent also to have printed at this point in the RECORD the personnel of our various committees: The Republican leadership, the policy committee, the campaign committee, the committee on committees, and the committee on personnel. I think this information will be of interest, because I have no recollection that the Republican conference rules have ever been published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the Republican conference rules and the personnel of Republican leadership, 86th Congress, 1st session, were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN CONFERENCE RULES [1]

I

At the beginning of each Congress, or within 1 week thereafter, a Republican Party conference shall be held. At that conference there shall be elected the following officers: chairman of the conference, secretary of the conference, floor leader, whip, chairman of policy committee, and a policy committee of 15 Senators.

The chairman of the conference, the secretary of the conference, the floor leader, the whip, the chairman of the policy committee, the chairman of the committee on committees, the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee, the chairman of the Republican personnel committee, and the President pro tem of the Senate (if a Republican), shall be members ex officio of the policy committee. The other six members shall be nominated by the chairman of the conference, subject to action by the conference. The six members so nominated and elected shall serve for 2 years and may be reelected for an additional 2 years, but no such member may serve more than 4 consecutive years and then shall be eligible for further service in such capacity only after an interval of 2 years. Within 24 hours after the election of the chairman of the conference each Senator may submit a list of six members suggested for nomination as members of the policy committee.

In all contested elections, vote shall be by written ballot.

The term of office of all party officers herein provided shall extend for not more than 2 years, and shall expire at the close of each Congress.

II

The chairman may call a conference at any time, and shall call a conference whenever requested to do so by the policy committee or in writing by five or more Senators. The policy committee shall meet at least once in 2 weeks, on a fixed day of the week and at a fixed hour to be determined by the committee. It may meet at any time on the call of its chairman. The committee shall permit any Senator to appear before it upon his request to present any matter in which he is interested.

III. DUTY OF PARTY OFFICERS

The chairman of the conference shall preside at all conference meetings, and perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by this resolution or by the conference.

The secretary shall keep accurate minutes of all conference proceedings. The minutes of all meetings of committees of the conference shall be kept by the party floor clerk and shall be filed with the secretary, which minutes shall be open to inspection by any member of the conference. The secretary and floor clerk, respectively, shall notify members of all conference and committee meetings. In the absence of the chairman, he shall have the same powers and duties to call meetings of the conference as the chairman.

The floor leader shall perform the customary duties of the majority or minority leader, as the case may be, on the floor of the Senate, and shall have full authority to deal with all questions of procedure after consulting the Republican Senators who are concerned.

The whip shall assist in securing attendance of members at party conferences and upon the floor of the Senate when their presence is considered necessary by the chairman or the floor leader, and shall perform such other duties as the chairman or floor leader may require.

The policy committee shall consider the legislative program in the Senate and the question whether any party policy is involved, shall prepare and present recommendations for action by the conference, and advise all Senators on legislative matters which they desire to present to the policy committee.

IV

A committee on committees shall be appointed at the beginning of each Congress to prepare and recommend to the conference the complete assignment of Republican Senators to committees, and shall recommend the filling of vacancies occurring during the Congress. The committee shall be appointed by the chairman of the conference immediately after his election subject to confirmation by the conference.

V

A Republican senatorial campaign committee shall be appointed at the beginning of each Congress by the chairman of the conference, subject to confirmation by the conference.

VI

No action by the conference upon any matter pending or to be proposed in the Senate shall be binding in any way on members in casting their votes thereon.

VII

These rules may be amended at any time by a majority vote of the conference, providing notice of the amendment has been given at least 1 week in advance to every member of the conference that action will be sought upon the subject covered by the amendment.

THE CAUSES OF INFLATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, Dr. Gardiner Means' dramatic and persuasive analysis of the contribution of "administered prices" to inflation is contributing a new dimension to understanding what causes inflation and what we can do about it. He has recently written a substantial additional analysis of the consequences of administered prices on the cost of living, and Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY DR. GARDINER C. MEANS SUBMITTED TO THE JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 16, 1959

Mr. Chairman and members of the Joint Economic Committee, I appreciate this opportunity to comment on the program for economic growth and stability contained in the Economic Report of the President. I am particularly concerned to do so because evidence I have available, some of which has already been introduced into your record, suggests that the President's program is based on a false conception of the twin problems of achieving full employment and preventing inflation.

First, let me discuss the matter of inflation. There are three types of inflation that need to be distinguished. First there is the classical type of inflation in which there is too much money chasing too few goods. This is a demand or monetary inflation. I believe there is general agreement among economists that if you start with full employment, the effect of an unbalanced budget and a loose monetary policy is to generate this kind of inflation. Also I believe there is general agreement that, under normal circumstances, a balanced budget and a tight money policy can prevent this type of inflation. This was the kind of inflation we had after the Second World War and again in the Korean war. Also there is a good deal of evidence that these classical inflations were over by 1953 and that by then the prices of commodities at the wholesale level had in very large measure adjusted to the new price level.

A second type of inflation is the rise of market-dominated prices in a recovery from a recession or depression. This type of inflation is often called a reflation because, unlike a monetary inflation which is harmful, it is a normal and necessary part of the process of economic recovery. Such a reflation does not involve a rise, or as much of a rise, in the inflexible administered prices since they do not usually drop as much as market-dominated prices in a recession. Of course, a balanced budget and a tight-money policy could stop such a rise of market-dominated prices but only by stopping the recovery and allowing unemployment to remain high.

The third type of inflation has been called an administrative inflation and involves a rise in prices in the more concentrated industries where there is a considerable area of discretion within which pricing policy can be made. Such pricing power clearly exists in such concentrated industries as steel and automobiles. It could also exist where markets are local and a few producers dominate the market. If this type of inflation occurs by itself, it involves a specialized price rise with the administration-dominated prices rising while market-dominated prices rise little or even fall. Such an administrative inflation could result from excessive wage increases or from business efforts to increase profit margins. But this kind of inflation does not come from a general excess of demand and it cannot be halted by contracting demand except by creating unemployment. Indeed, there is some question whether even a very sizable amount of unemployment could prevent an administrative inflation as I will show below. Control of this type of inflation by a balanced budget and tight money can only succeed through high unemployment and may not succeed even then.

The relation between these three types of inflation should be noted. Classical inflation and reflation are, by their nature, exclusive since a classical inflation starts with full employment while reflation ends with full employment. On the other hand, an administrative inflation can accompany either or even occur when there is a general deflation in progress.

In recent testimony before the Senate Anti-Trust and Monopoly Subcommittee under the chairmanship of Senator KEFAUVER, I presented a set of charts which help to emphasize the difference between a classical inflation and an administrative inflation. I should like to introduce those charts here, though two of them have already been introduced into your record by Mr. Reuther.

The first two charts concern the period of inflation following the Second World War and the start of the Korean war. The inflation of this period was classical in its source, with too much demand seeking too few goods. Also it was classical in its results, a more or less general lift in the price level. This can be seen in chart I which shows the percentage increase from 1942 to 1953 in each of the commodity groups composing the BLS Wholesale Price Index.

Before discussing the chart, I want to say a word about why I selected the period from 1942 to 1953 as the period of the war inflations. I started with 1942 because the reflation from the great depression of the 1930's was not complete until then. In 1940 we had 8 million unemployed and in 1941 we still averaged 5.5 million unemployed. By early 1942, we had virtually full employment and the wholesale price index had just returned to the level it held in 1926–29 before the depression. For the end of the inflation period, I selected 1953 which was 2 years after the peak of the war inflation had been reached and the first of 2½ years of relative stability in the wholesale price index. By that time, commodity prices had recovered from most of the distortions arising from the process of inflation itself.

In chart I, each price group in the BLS Wholesale Price Index is represented by a column. The height of the column indicates the percent price increase from 1942 to 1953. The width of the column indicates the relative weight of the group in the wholesale price index. The area of the column indicates the contribution each group made to the rise in the wholesale price index.

The first thing to notice in chart I is the relatively general character of this classical inflation. With the exception of the extremes of lumber at one end and rubber at the other, there is a considerable similarity in the price movement. Seventy percent of the groups by weight rose between 49 and 77 percent. This is very much the result to be expected from a typical classical inflation. The difference in percentage increase for different groups presumably reflect the special conditions of supply and demand affecting each group, in addition to the general inflationary forces operating on all groups. Indeed these differences involve the kind of relative price adjustments which could be expected in the absence of inflation.

A second thing to notice is that there is no tendency for the administration-dominated prices of concentrated industries to behave differently from the market-dominated prices of the nonconcentrated industries. The black columns in the chart represent price groups in which administration-dominated prices are in heavy predominance; the light gray, those in which market-dominated prices prevail; and the dark gray, those with a more equal mixture of both types. As can be seen, some of the black groups went up less than average, others more. Some of the light gray went up less, some more than average. There is no evidence here of a significant difference in the behavior of the market-dominated and the administration-dominated prices. This further emphasizes the general character of this classical inflation so far as the end results are concerned.

When we look at the process of inflation, however, we find a quite unclassical difference in behavior between market and administration-dominated prices. In the beginning of a monetary inflation, market-dominated prices tend to rise more rapidly while administration-dominated prices lag well behind. Then, in a period of readjustment, market-dominated prices fall back while administration-dominated prices continue to rise until the two groups are more nearly in balance. The first stage in this process is shown in chart II. This chart does for the period 1942–47 what chart I does for the whole period. As can be seen, the price indexes for the market-dominated groups as a whole rose much more rapidly than the price indexes of the more concentrated industries. Thus, the behavior of administration-dominated prices helped to slow up the classical inflation rather than to initiate it. Only in the later stages did they catch up. This differential behavior in a classical inflation needs to be emphasized because it is so different from the differential behavior of these two groups of prices in the most recent inflation.

Charts III and IV shows the same kind of analysis for the inflation since 1953. Chart III shows the changes in prices from 1953 to 1957 and chart IV shows changes from 1953 to October 1958, the most recent date for which I had data at the time the charts were prepared. The year 1953 rather than the first half of 1955 was used as the starting point because there was a considerable amount of administrative inflation between those two periods which was covered up in the wholesale price index by the fact that reflation from the 1954 depression was not complete until the middle of 1955. This is clearly shown in the following table which indicates the percent price change for the 15 groups composing the wholesale index from the average for 1953 to the average for the first 6 months of 1955. The categories in black brackets are the black categories of the charts and represent the administration-dominated groups while those in light brackets are the dark gray categories representing mixed groups:

Commodity group:	Percent change 1953 to first half of 1955
[Rubber and rubber products]	+11
[Tobacco manufactures and bottled beverages]	+5
[Metal and metal products]	+4
[Nonmetallic minerals]	+3½
[Machinery and motive products]	+3
Lumber and lumber products	+1½
[Chemicals and allied products]	+1
[Pulp, paper and allied products]	+1
[Furniture and other household durables]	+1
[Fuel, power and lighting materials]	−1½
Processed food	−2
Textile products and apparel	−2
Miscellaneous products	−4
Farm products	−4½
Hides, skins, leather and leather products	−6

In this recession and recovery period, all six of the administration-dominated groups rose, five of them substantially while all but one of the market-dominated groups were below their 1953 level, three of them substantially. This suggests that the administrative inflation was in operation even between 1953 and the first half of 1955.

In this connection, I would call your attention to the chart on page 11 of the Economic Report of the President which uses the same base year 1953 and shows the more or less continuous rise of the prices of manufactured products.

The story told by charts III and IV is clear. In the price increase from 1953 to 1957, shown in chart III, the six administration-dominated groups rose most, the three mixed groups rose to an intermediate degree and the market-dominated groups rose little or actually fell. In chart IV, the comparison has been extended to October 1958 and also the metal and metal products group has been broken into semifinished and finished steel, fabricated steel, and metal and metal products (except steel), in order to bring out the important role played by steel prices in this period. Again the evidence clearly points to an administrative, not a classical, inflation.

The same differential phenomenon appears in the 1957–58 recession. The table below compares price changes from the second quarter of 1957 before the sharp recession began to the second quarter of 1958 when industrial production reached its lowest point. The analysis is limited to industrial products since, as the Economic Report points out, the prices of farm and food products reflect the sizable contraction in the supply of certain farm products, notably a short supply of fresh fruit and vegetables, due to bad weather conditions and the short supply of cattle. The metal and metal products group has been divided as in chart IV.

Price change:	2d quarter 1957 to 2d quarter 1958
Miscellaneous	+7.2
[Semifinished and finished steel]	+4.1
[Machinery and motive products]	+3.0
[Tobacco manufactures and bottled beverages]	+2.7
[Fabricated steel]	+2.7
[Furniture and other household durables]	+1.4
[Pulp, paper, and allied products]	+1.3
[Chemicals and allied products]	+1.2
Hides, skins, leather, and leather products	+.9
[Nonmetallic minerals]	+.3
[Rubber and rubber products]	−.4
Textile products and apparel	−2.0
Lumber and wood products	−3.2
[Fuel, power, and lighting materials]	−6.7
[Metal and metal products (ex steel)]	−9.9
Farm products	+7.8
Processed foods	+7.0

During this year of recession the industrial price average was very stable. But this stability of the industrial price index was a product of two opposite and offsetting developments, a continued inflation of administration-dominated prices and a deflation of market-dominated prices.

In the partial reflation period since last spring, the administrative inflation appears to have continued along with some reflation of market-dominated industrial prices, a compound movement which has been masked in the wholesale price index by the offsetting fall in the indexes of farm and food products as the particular scarcities of last spring have disappeared.

In the light of these facts, I do not think the Economic Report of the President is warranted in stating that, "We may justifiably take satisfaction in the fact that the price level has been reasonably steady of late" (p. 4).

Also I do not accept the statement of the Economic Report that, "We may justifiably take satisfaction in the increases already achieved in employment, production, and incomes (p. 4). Rather, the failure of recovery to continue is a cause for some alarm. Consider the present situation.

As is true of most recessions, a part of the recent recession was a contraction of inventory. In recovery, the reversal of inventory contraction and the rebuilding of inventories is an important factor in contributing to a renewal of demand. But in the partial recovery to date, contraction of inventories had ceased by the middle of the fourth quarter of 1957 and the rebuilding of inventories is likely to be spread over a much longer period. As a result most of the impetus for recovery to be expected from this source has spent itself. Nor is there a sign of greatly expanded private investment. And yet unemployment is significantly greater than it was a year ago and during the last three months recovery has just kept pace with the normal growth in the labor force. For three months there has been no progress toward the recovery of full employment. Apparently in the presence of the tight money policy the Federal deficit, now running at the annual rate of $6 or $7 billion a year, is all that is keeping us from renewed recession and greater unemployment.

This seems to me to pose a major dilemma. The tight money policy was appropriately adopted in 1955, when there was heavy demand for capital goods, and if the inflation after early 1956 had been a product of a general excess of demand, the continuance of the tight money policy would have been called for. But a contraction of demand to control an administrative inflation is to limit expansion and force recession. Of course, it would be possible, by limiting demand, to prevent a rise in the average of wholesale prices by forcing down market-dominated prices enough to offset the rise in administration-dominated prices as clearly happened between the second quarter of 1957 and that of 1958. But this is to place the burden of price stability on small business, farmers, and the unemployed. Also, the evidence suggests that this does not stop the administrative inflation; it only masks it. And if recovery occurs, the reflation of market-dominated prices will unmask the administrative inflation that has already occurred.

Some people have suggested that, because of administrative inflation, we have to choose between price stability and underemployment on the one hand and full employment and creeping administrative inflation on the other. These do not seem to me to be the only choices. I believe it is well within our power to bring about both full employment and a stable price level. I hope that your committee will examine the problem as I have outlined it and, if you agree with the substance of my conclusions, will undertake to resolve this dilemma. Further, I would like to suggest that, in searching for a solution, you distinguish between (1) temporary measures which would allow the expansion of demand through fiscal and monetary means without engendering further administrative inflation even though such measures might not have long run value and (2) a more permanent solution which is likely to develop only out of extensive study of the problem and is not likely to be a simple solution if the values of free enterprise and the efficiencies of big business are to be preserved.

(1) Contains: Foundry and forged products; metal containers; hardware; fabricated structural metal products; fabricated nonstructural metal products. The weighted index resulting from combining these separate indexes contains some nonsteel products which could be removed by a more detailed segregation but is not likely to alter the index significantly.

(2) Contains: Iron ore; iron and steel scrap; pig and ferro alloys; nonferrous metals; plumbing equipment; heating equipment. The resulting weighted index contains some items of steel particularly in plumbing and heating equipment which involve both steel and other metals particularly cast iron. Since nonferrous metals constitute 20 percent of the weight in the combined index the steel inclusions cannot significantly influence the index.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that two excellent letters commenting on Dr. Means' analysis, one by Eugene Havas, which appeared in the February 19 edition of the Washington Post, and the other by Barrow Lyons, of Independent Features, be printed in the RECORD at this point following my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post and Times Herald, Feb. 19, 1959]

"THOSE ADMINISTERED PRICES"

Congratulations on your forceful editorial of February 8 on "Those Administered Prices" and Bernard D. Nossiter's lucid presentation of this new type of inflation.

You have performed a great public service by printing Dr. Gardiner Means' charts comparing the administrative-type inflation of 1953–58 with the wartime inflation of 1942–47, so that the average man can understand what is plaguing us and could urge Congress to do something about it.

It is clear from Dr. Means' conclusions that the steel industry passed on to the consumer not only the wage increases granted to its employees, but much more. Indeed, in the last 10 years the leader of the steel industry, the United States Steel Corp., increased its dividend fourfold from 4 or 5 percent to 18 percent, reinvested more than $1,250 million from undistributed profits, set up a pension fund of $1 billion, and wrote off about $2 billion in normal and accelerated depreciation.

No wonder that the equity of the United States Steel, which was valued at about $550 million by the stock market in 1948, increased to about $5 billion at current stock exchange prices. Somewhat similar is the story of the Bethlehem Steel Corp., which increased its dividends in the period of 1947 to 1957 from 6 to 28 percent.

These two corporations are producing about half of the total of the steel output and dictate the price policy of the industry. Had they refused to increase their prices in August 1958, following the announcement of a $4.50 per ton increase of the other companies such as Armco Steel, Jones-Laughlin, Republic Steel, there is no doubt that the price increases would have been rescinded by these lesser producers.

Whether some of the less efficient marginal steel companies needed the increase to maintain profitable operation is debatable; what is certain is that some of the big companies such as United States Steel, Bethlehem, Republic, etc., did not need it. Unless, of course, we are willing to acquiesce that United States Steel and Bethlehem Steel needed to earn close to 100 percent on their equity capital (before taxes) or that they needed to continue to pay a dividend of 18 or 28 percent, inaugurated in the prosperous years of 1956–57.

The average man does not realize that the so-called regular quarterly dividend of $0.75 for U.S. Steel, or $0.60 for Bethlehem Steel corresponds to 18 percent or 28 percent because the $100 par value stock was split in 1949 and in 1955 to the ratio of 1 to 6 in the case of U.S. Steel and 1 to 12 in the case of Bethlehem Steel. In the first half of 1957, when the steel industry operated at about 90 percent capacity, these two companies earned more than 100 percent on their equities before taxes, and at the present more than 80 percent operating capacity they are approximating that high profit ratio again.

Is it surprising that in face of such high profits steelworkers are restless and want another wage increase in the coming negotiations this spring? They can point to the huge benefits the managers are obtaining from their stock options. The annual report of U.S. Steel states that options were granted at $18.50 per share in 1953. These shares are now quoted around $90, so that in 5 years there is a capital gain of 500 percent, a free ride on the waves of administered price inflation.

This clearly demonstrates that the managers of the big corporations have a vested interest to make good on their stock option and that their pricing practices are not unrelated to their own interest, which is not identical with the public interest.

That such a situation calls for action by Congress is obvious. It is useless to hope that either the policy of the Federal Reserve System or budgetary measures, however sound and necessary they are by themselves, can stop inflation spurred by administrative price increases. The executive officers of the giant corporations cannot be unbiased judges of what is good for the country, when their actions of raising prices could so enhance their private fortunes.

Secretary Anderson, testifying before the joint congressional committee, said that when speculation is safe and saving is a gamble, the country is in a bad way. Nothing can be more true. Let us hope that Secretary Anderson will act in accord with his wise statement and present Congress with effective measures to stop the free ride on inflation.

He can do that by taxing profits realized on stock options at regular income tax rates, instead of the 25 percent capital gain rates. He can propose taxes for stock splits which are characteristic of an inflationary psychology: that it is safe to speculate and foolish to save or invest in Government bonds.

All the efforts of the administration to achieve price stability, balanced budget, and last but not least the easier and less expensive refinancing of the $80 billion Government debt due in a year, will be in vain if no appropriate measures are taken to end the now prevailing administrative pricing practices in the steel industry. Another steel price increase in July 1959, would further impair the present disequilibrium of our economy and the soundness of the dollar.

EUGENE HAVAS.

WASHINGTON.—A simple chart produced for the Kefauver Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Senate has created a more disturbing effect upon the professional political mind than anything that has happened since the November elections. Matter of fact, it is one of the most important bits of economic evidence telling what is rotten with the American economy ever published.

This nasty little chart shows that since 1953 the only subsantial increases which have occurred in the wholesale price index have been in the highly concentrated (monopolized) industries. This is something hard to face and admit—at least for a lot of people.

Steel leads the procession with an increase of 37 percent in the 6 years encompassing 1953–58. (The figures stop at October 1958.) Machinery and motive equipment come next with a boost of 22 percent; fabricated steel next with 21 percent.

Then, in the following order, ranging downward between 20 and 10 percent follow rubber, non-metallic minerals, pulp and paper, tobacco and beverages. These are the chief culprits responsible for the rise in wholesale prices, and reflected in thousands of retail items.

THE MINOR OFFENDERS

Then there are four groups in which monopoly is only partial—where there remains a degree of price competition. The increase in the wholesale price index for these ranges between 8 and 3 percent. They are furniture, metal products other than steel, chemicals, fuel, and power. In this same class is the processed foods industry, in which competition still exists. Also, but showing much smaller price increases in the 6 years, are hides and leather products, and lumber and wood products—the last showing virtually no inflation.

Three industry groups show falling prices since 1953—textiles and apparel, farm products, and miscellaneous products. The last, which comprises many small, competitive industries in which there are many participants, is the low man on the totem pole. In the miscellaneous group the price decline is 7 percent, reflecting the plight of the small businessman in general. The farmer fared only slightly better. Wholesale farm prices dropped 4 percent in the 6 years. In all of these industries there is active competition.

An illuminating sidelight upon the chart is another which shows that between the period 1942–47 all of the largest increases were in the industries in which competition existed, while somewhat more moderate advances were made in the price-administered industries, those in which monopoly controls are exercised.

The point is that the 1942–47 period was one of commodity scarcity in which market conditions caused prices to rise. The 1953–58 period has been one of commodity availability, in which the free market industries have been hit by price declines, but the monopolized industries have relentlessly pushed prices upward despite plentiful supplies.

CREDIT TO GARDINER MEANS

The author of these charts was Dr. Gardiner C. Means, 25 years ago a leading Government ecoonmist, who became associated with the Committee for Economic Development in 1940 as its chief research economist. Until recently Dr. Means has remained with this group, regarded as the "leftwing" of the Big Business "progressives." Eric Johnston was its organizer.

It was chiefly the work of Dr. Means in the 1930's that revealed the disastrous effect of administered prices in driving the great depression to its lowest depths. In his most recent revelation he again casts a searchlight upon the problem of administered prices—showing how the inflexibility of monopoly-dominated industries almost inevitably increases unemployment. This time it is because prices have been forced higher in the face of receding demand; and now, although demand is improving, monopoly places a brake upon recovery.

ECONOMIC MERRY-GO-ROUND

While the Means charts have made a deep impression upon the economists, and upon those politicians who understand charts, they are not the tools with which elections are won.

So both the Democrats and Republicans are going to prove what is wrong with the economy. With the full support of Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON, the Joint Economic Committee of Congress will stage a full-dress investigation of the situation. Of course, it will be searching and nonpartisan. One can hardly expect it to be bipartisan, for desperate wrangling and obstruction between opposite camps is virtually inevitable.

The forthcoming investigation has been compared with the hearings held by the Temporary National Economic Committee between 1949 and 1951. Those comprised one of the most searching inquiries into our economy ever made by Congress. But the press did not follow the story very closely, and the war came along before findings could be digested and publicized; so the public never knew much about the TNEC investigation.

REPUBLICAN INVESTIGATION

On the other hand, President Eisenhower has appointed Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON as chairman of a Cabinet committee to explore and expose the problems of inflation.

There can be little doubt that organized labor will be held accountable for a large part of what ails us. Already the tocsin is being rung over the decline in foreign trade—all organized labor's fault for demanding higher wages, and thus outpricing the rest of the world. We should have lower wage standards, so that we can compete in the mad scramble of international competition, especially with Russia, it is claimed.

Few men are able to understand the intricacies of modern economic thought and doctrine. The testimony of experts is taken with large chunks of mental rocksalt because of the well-known habit of many economists to defend a point-of-view, rather than to speak as independent scientists. Even the college economists are not exempt from this charge in many instances, especially since big business has urged industrial support of university financial foundations. Thus, the public is confused.

THE PEOPLE'S INSTINCTS

Yet, despite the economic smog generated by the conflicting experts, despite the dependency of the great media of mass communication upon the advertising dollar, somehow the people, in time, get a sense of what is going on.

In countries where democratic tradition is less firmly rooted than in the United States the result of mass intuition can be violent revolution. We have seen this happen recently in Cuba. In the United States a political and economic cleansing, such as occurred in 1932, comes by peaceful methods.

Although the people are becoming very uneasy, we are generally still too comfortable for drastic action, most observers believe. Monopoly is still quite safe.

Harvey O'Connor, author of The Empire of Oil, writing recently on the visit of Fidel Castro to Venezuela compared that visit to the one Argentina's President Frondizi made to the United States. O'Connor's comment is searching. He asks: "Where is hope to be found? In the hearts of the people, or in the Treasuries of Washington and Wall Street?"

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished acting minority leader [Mr. KUCHEL] if there is any further business to come before the Senate?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wonder if my friend the Senator from Oregon would suggest the absence of a quorum, so that I might have a very brief opportunity to inquire into the matter.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, under the order previously entered, I now move that the Senate stand in adjournment until Thursday of this week at noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 12 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until Thursday, February 26, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

II Kings 5: 1: He also was a mighty man in valour.

Most merciful and gracious God, we have assembled here to commemorate the birthday of George Washington whom we reverently and affectionately call the Father of His Country.

Our minds and hearts expand with gratitude and pride when we think of his spirit of adventure, his fortitude in times of hardship, and his fidelity to the principles of righteousness and justice which inspired him to champion the cause of the oppressed Colonists.

We thank Thee above all for his forcible spirit and devout faith which sent him down on his knees in prayer in order that he might know how to march in step with the eternal will and wisdom of God.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 19, 1959, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 84

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. Daniel A. Reed, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until Monday next.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. CARLSON members of the Joint Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 59–6.

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the order of the House of February 16, 1959, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginial, Mr. MOORE, to read George Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. MOORE read the Farewell Address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, suffering, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they addressed themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter. Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and maintaining within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only, that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be involved, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding of them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit or party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasion of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes, that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties), ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessary parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interest.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith: Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collusions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you my countrymen, these counsels of an old an affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe; my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Foreign Relations, 1796–1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on Saturday night it was my privilege to deliver an address before the Sons of the Revolution, at Troy, N.Y. The meeting was a very interesting one. I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from my remarks on that occasion be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(Excerpts of text prepared for delivery by Senator WILEY before Sons of the Revolution, at Troy, N.Y., Feb. 21, 1959, at 7 p.m.)

If Washington could revisit the United States today, about the only thing he would recognize would be the institutions of the Government which he helped to found and of which he was the first Chief Executive. In every physical respect, the country has changed and so has its place in the world, since 1796. Indeed, the change which has occurred in these 163 years is greater than the change which had occurred in all the time from 1796 back to Adam's bite out of the apple in the Garden of Eden. This change is continuing, and at an accelerating pace.

The challenge of 1796 was whether a new and relatively weak country, with a government founded on new and revolutionary principles, could survive in a skeptical and largely hostile world. The challenge of 1959 is whether this same country, now grown to be the richest and strongest on earth, can adapt itself with sufficient speed and flexibility to the rapidly changing world environment in which it finds itself.

The fact that Washington would still recognize the institutions of his Government is a tribute to the skill and wisdom with which he and his contemporaries laid the foundations for those institutions. The triangular structure of the Federal Government has proved itself both durable and flexible. It has, of course, grown to meet the new demands with which it has been confronted in each succeeding generation of its existence; but at the same time, it has retained in basic form the beautiful simplicity with which the Founding Fathers endowed it.

Washington became President at a time when Britain and France, the two titans of Europe, were engaged in bitter struggle. They were entering the last quarter of the Second Hundred Years War, and neither was overly respectful of the rights of the insignificant neutral on the western side of the Atlantic. From the long history of European wars and from the circumstances of the time, Washington correctly sensed that a policy of neutrality—or more accurately a policy of noninvolvement—was most likely to promote the national interests of the United States.

It was by no means certain, as Washington assumed the Presidency, that the United States was strong enough to resist involvement in the European war. This question was still in doubt at the end of Washington's second term, and he recognized this fact in his farewell address when he said:

"If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off * * * when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected."

Washington hoped that the period was not far off; he knew it had not yet arrived. And in fact, within less than two decades of the farewell address, the United States was drawn into the final convulsion of the Anglo-French war.

In the same sentence which I have just quoted from his Farewell Address, Washington also predicted the period to be not far off "when we may defy material injury from external annoyance."

"Why," he asked, "forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?"

It was, and is, a good question. The only trouble is that the period which Washington foresaw to be not far off—the period "when we may defy material injury from external annoyance"—has come and gone. Thanks in part to the benign presence on the high seas of the British Navy, we enjoyed such a period for the century which intervened between the end of the Napoleonic Wars and the beginning of World War I.

But increasingly since 1914, the onrush of technology has ended our physical isolation in the world. And it has correspondingly made impossible a policy of political isolation.

Some, who were not convinced of this by World War I, were convinced by Pearl Harbor.

Others, who were not convinced by Pearl Harbor, were convinced by Hiroshima.

Others, who still remained skeptical, were convinced by the ICBM.

And finally, any who even then were not convinced, must certainly have been persuaded by sputnik.

This snowballing technology, on which no Nation has a monopoly, is at the bottom of the biggest political problem we face today; indeed, it is the heart and core of that problem.

It has given both to us and to the Soviet Union the means literally of destroying the human race.

It has awakened the aspirations of those two-thirds of the human race who for centuries have been somnolent under the pall of a deadening and all-pervading poverty.

It has made a better life possible for the hundreds of millions of Asia and Africa; and, through its improvements in communications, it has made it possible for these millions to glimpse the better life.

It has likewise made possible a better life for us, the American people, and we have been enjoying this better life. Never have so many lived so well.

This greater material well-being may have within it the seeds of its own destruction unless we come to grips with the implications of technological growth. I am frank to say I do not think we have even begun to glimpse those implications.

We are confronted, literally, with a choice between life and death, in a form in which it has never been presented before. If it is death, it will be, as I said, total death. If it is life, it can be—perhaps we can even say it will have to be—a more abundant life than has ever been known.

This has all come about so rapidly that we have not yet adjusted our thinking and our habits of living to it. What complicates the matter is that this change is not a single incident in history; it cannot be neatly bounded in time. It is a continuing process, and it is continuing at a rapidly growing rate. Great as has been its progress up till now, I think we are still only on the threshold of this technological revolution. And make no mistake about it: It is by far the greatest, the most portentious revolution of all time.

The possibilities, and the problems, which are opened up to us by this revolution are as boundless as the revolution itself. We can content ourselves with using the instruments it gives us for our own comfort and luxury and can for a period—I fear it will be a brief one—wallow in our private swimming pools, with the color television sets, the station wagons, and the hi-fi apparatus which are spewed out by our technology and our industry.

Or, we can use the new tools which we have acquired to secure our own place in the world and thereby put our rising standard of living on a firmer base. For example, we can—and we must use our new sources of energy to provide ourselves with better missiles and other means of defense. But we should also use these new sources to power the kind of irrigation projects which will make the deserts of the world bloom.

We can use our new found knowledge of electronics to bring Steve Allen into half the living rooms of America. But we should also use this same knoweldge to communicate the truth about ourselves to the hundreds of millions of people who are living in intellectual darkness.

What I am trying to say is that technology has now put into the hands of man instruments of the most awful potential for good or for evil. I emphasize that these instruments are in the hands of man; they are not in our hands alone. They can be used, I think—if we are wise enough—not only for strictly technical purposes, but also for broader sociological purposes. Science and technology, in other words, offer one means of building at least some kind of a bridge—fragile though it may be—between us and the Russians. One advantage of this approach is that it is nonpolitical and emphasizes the things that are common to all men. Most people would rather be well-fed than hungry, warm rather than cold, healthy rather than sick. There is no ideology in a slide rule, or hybrid corn, or a vial of penicillin. We should seize every opportunity, however, slight, to work together for constructive purposes rather than to work separately for mutual destruction.

On the foreign scene, the technological revolution has complicated our problems, as I have described, primarily because it has transformed communications, transportation, and weapons.

On the domestic scene, it has created what may well be an even bigger problem. At the same time that it has made the physical side of life easier, it has made the intellectual side of life enormously more difficult. The educational effort which must now go into producing a scientist or an engineer is vastly greater than what was required even a generation ago. But even so, it is a great deal easier for an individual to become a qualified atomic scientist than it is for him to become a qualified atomic statesman, and I hope those in charge of our schools will keep this fact in mind.

It has not been very long since leisure was the exclusive property of the upper class. The technological revolution could quite conceivably reverse that. We already have a situation where the factory laborer works 40 hours a week and spends his weekends on the golf course or at the movies or just puttering about the house; while, on the other hand, the factory manager works 6 days a week and spends most of Sunday worrying about next week. The Government clerk works a 40-hour week; his boss is likely to work 60 or 70 hours. What we are seeing, I think, is a reverse twist on the old Marxist doctrine—life is getting easier and easier for more and more people while it is getting harder and harder for fewer and fewer. This has within it political and social implications of the most profound and incalculable nature.

I shall certainly not attempt to deal with all of these implications, but let me comment in passing on only one of them, and this is a rather superficial one. It is frequently said these days, especially since sputnik went up, that children don't have to work hard enough in school. That may or may not be true, but it is difficult for me to understand how a father can logically expect his child to work harder than the father himself does. If a father sets an example of spending Saturday afternoon in front of a television set, does he really expect his son to spend Saturday afternoon with an algebra book?

I don't know what to do about this, or about the other problems I have mentioned. I do know that the first step in solving a problem is to define it, and I think that we haven't yet even begun to define some of our problems very precisely.

Now let me mention just one more change which has occurred since Washington's time—this on a somewhat different level from those I have been talking about. In 1790 the budget request for the domestic expenses of the Department of State was a little less than $8,000. This included the salary of the Secretary, which was $3,500, and eight employees—five clerks, a French interpreter, and two messengers. In addition, it included $691 to pay for rent, firewood, stationery, and newspapers.

Congress reduced the total from a little less than $8,000 to a little more than $6,000.

In 1792 the estimated cost of the Foreign Service—as distinguished from the domestic expenses of the State Department—was $40,000. This included the cost of 5 Ministers and 16 consular officers abroad.

By way of contrast, in the President's budget currently before Congress for the fiscal year 1960 the requests for the State Department, including both its foreign and domestic expenses, total $243 million. To this should be added requests of $107 million for the U.S. Information Agency and $3,498 million for the mutual security program.

Despite these and other changes, however, there has been an enduring quality, not only in our institutions, as I mentioned at the outset, but also in our basic approach to policy. This can be very clearly traced in the policy pronouncements of our first and our present Secretary of State. Ten days after assuming the Office of Secretary of 1790, Jefferson wrote to his friend, the Marquis de Lafayette:

"I think, with others, that nations are to be governed with regard to their own interests, but I am convinced that it is to their interest, in the long run, to be grateful, faithful to their engagements, even in the worst of circumstances, and honorable and generous always. If I had not known that the head of our Government was in these sentiments, and that his national and private ethics were the same, I would never have been where I am."

The same ideas, of course, recur in the writings of the then head of the Government, that is, General Washington. And I am sure that our Secretary of State would also say that he would not be Secretary unless these ideas were shared likewise by the present head of the Government, General Eisenhower. And compare Jefferson's letter with a speech which Dulles made less than a month before he assumed the office of Secretary:

"I believe that we can still follow the good American tradition of openness, simplicity, and morality in foreign policy. The need today is to rekindle faith in freedom, and make it contagious, by a fresh demonstration of what to do with freedom."

That was good doctrine in 1796; it was good doctrine in 1952; and it remains good doctrine in 1959. It is, as Lincoln said of the Declaration of Independence, a sentiment "which gave liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but, I hope, to the world for all future time."

May I summarize foreign relations, 1796–1959:

In the earlier date there were two great nations, France and England. Now there are two—Russia and the United States.

Then we stood alone against the world—now England and France and the West stand with us against the Kremlin.

Then the world was large, taking months to cross the Atlantic—now we fly around the world in 40 hours.

Then there was no radio, or telegraph, or television, or telephone; no steam, or electric engines; no aircraft; no electronics. Now, as indicated, we are in the heart of a new great revolutionary age.

Then we were the laughing stock of the kingdoms of the world—now we are the envy.

Then we were experimenting with the rights of man while the kings were experimenting with curtailing those rights.

Then we stood alone, apart as the new experiment in government, independent and flexing our muscles. Now we stand, not alone, but interdependent and providing the bedrock for the free nations to rest on.

Then we had but a pittance of a national income and a national market—now we have one-half of the market of the world, and one-half of the income.

Then we talked of noninvolvement in the affairs of Europe—now, because every nation is neighbor to every other nation, we are involved not only in the affairs of Europe, but in the affairs of the whole earth.

Then we were about 15 percent urban and 85 percent agricultural. Now, the reverse is the truth.

Then we stretched along the Atlantic coast, now we encompass the whole distance between the oceans and the gulf.

Then a people of 4 million, now a people of 175 million.

I conclude in the words of Washington: "Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair."

The Role of the Supreme Court as the Interpreter of the Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I have served in the Senate with many able lawyers. However, I do not believe that I have ever served with or known a greater lawyer than the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN]. He is a jurist of experience and a scholar of many years of labor. He delivered a very noteworthy speech before the trust division of the American Bankers' Association in New York City on February 11 entitled "The Role of the Supreme Court as the Interpreter of the Constitution."

I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD so that it will be available to all who are interested in the preservation of the Constitution of the United States.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROLE OF THE SUPREME COURT AS THE INTERPRETER OF THE CONSTITUTION

(Address by U.S. Senator SAM J. ERVIN, JR., Democrat of North Carolina, before a meeting of the trust division of the American Bankers Association, New York City)

The constitution of my native State of North Carolina has always contained a warning which all Americans would do well to heed. It is this: "A frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty." Let us pause for a few moments, and recur to some fundamental principles.

The men who composed the Constitutional Convention of 1787 were wise men. They had read the history of the long and bitter struggle of man for freedom, and had found this shocking but everlasting truth inscribed upon each page of that history: No man or set of men can be safely trusted with governmental power of an unlimited nature. As a consequence, they were determined, above all things, to establish a government of laws and not of men.

To prevent the exercise of arbitrary power by the Federal Government, they embodied in the Constitution the doctrine of the separation of governmental powers. In so doing, they utilized this doctrine in a twofold way. They delegated to the Federal Government the powers necessary to enable it to discharge its functions as a central government, and they left to each State the power to regulate its own internal affairs. It was this use of the doctrine of the separation of powers which prompted Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase to make this trenchant observation in Texas v. White: "The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible union, composed of indestructible States."

In their other utilization of the doctrine of the separation of governmental powers, the members of the Convention of 1787 vested the power to make laws in the Congress, the power to execute laws in the President, and the power to interpret laws in the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress might establish. Moreover, they declared, in essence, that the legislative, the executive, and the judicial powers of the Federal Government should forever remain separate and distinct from each other.

This brings me to my subject: "The Role of the Supreme Court as the Interpreter of the Constitution."

In discussing this subject, I must tell you the truth about the Supreme Court.

I know it is not popular in some quarters to tell the truth about this tribunal. Admonitions of this character come to us daily from such quarters: When the Supreme Court speaks, its decisions must be accepted as sacrosanct by the bench, the bar, and the people of America, even though they constitute encroachments on the constitutional domain of the President or the Congress, or tend to reduce the States to meaningless zeros on the Nation's map. Indeed, the bench, the bar, and the people must do more than this. They must speak of the Supreme Court at all times with a reverence akin to that which inspired Job to speak thus of Jehovah: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust Him."

To be sure, all Americans should obey the decrees in cases to which they are parties, even though they may honestly and reasonably deem such degrees unwarranted. But it is sheer intellectual rubbish to contend that Americans are required to believe in the infallibility of judges, or to make mental obeisance to judicial aberrations. They have an inalienable right to think and speak their honest thoughts concerning all things under the sun, including the decisions of Supreme Court majorities. It is well this is so because the late Chief Justice Harlan F. Stone spoke an indisputable truth when he said: "Where the courts deal, as ours do, with great public questions, the only protection against unwise decisions, and even judicial usurpation, is careful scrutiny of their action, and fearless comment upon it."

As one whose major efforts have centered in the administration of justice, I have the abiding conviction that tyranny on the bench is as objectionable as tyranny on the throne and that my loyalty to constitutional government compels me to oppose it. In entertaining this conviction, I find myself in the company of such great Americans as Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and Abraham Lincoln, who refused to accept in abject silence what they conceived to be judicial usurpations.

I do not find it easy to express my disapproval of the action of the Supreme Court. I was taught in my youth to repose an absolute confidence in that Tribunal by my father, an active practitioner of law in North Carolina for 65 years, who was accustomed to refer to it with almost reverential awe. He used to say that the Supreme Court would administer justice according to law even though the heavens fell.

I regret to say, however, that the course of the Supreme Court in recent years has been such as to cause me to ponder the question whether fidelity to fact ought not to induce its members to remove from the portal of the building which houses it the majestic words, "Equal Justice Under Law" and to substitute for them the superscription, "Not justice under law, but justice according to the personal notions of the temporary occupants of this building."

Let me confess that I live in the South. Let me also confess that I deem the school desegregation decisions constitutionally indefensible. Nevertheless I assure you that I would be compelled to hold the opinion I have just expressed even if the school desegregation decisions had never been made.

The truth is that on many occasions during recent years the Supreme Court has usurped and exercised the power of the Congress and the States to amend the Constitution while professing to interpret it.

In so doing, the Supreme Court has encroached upon the constitutional powers of Congress as the Nation's legislative body, and struck down State action and State legislation in areas clearly committed to the States by our system of constitutional government. This action has been accompanied by overruling, repudiating, or ignoring many contrary precedents of earlier years.

A study of the decisions invalidating State action and State legislation compels the conclusion that some Supreme Court Justices now deem themselves to be the final and infallible supervisors of the desirability or wisdom of all State action and all State legislation.

This is tragic indeed, because there is nothing truer than the belief attributed to the late Justice Louis D. Brandeis by Judge Learned Hand, that the States are the only breakwater against the ever-pounding surf which threatens to submerge the individual and destroy the only kind of society in which personality can survive.

Time does not permit me to analyze or even enumerate all of the decisions which sustain what I have said. I must content myself with stating in summary form the effect of only a few of them.

Congress is told by the Court that it really did not mean what it said in exceedingly plain English when it enacted statutes to regulate the naturalization of aliens and to punish criminal conspiracies to overthrow the Government by force. Congress is told by the Court that its committees must conduct their investigations according to rules imposed by the Court which make it virtually certain that no information will ever be obtained from an unwilling witness. Political parties are told by the Court that they must admit to their membership persons who oppose the things for which they stand. California is told by the Court that it cannot punish its residents for criminal offenses committed within its borders if such residents are ignorant of the statutes creating such criminal offenses. California and New Mexico are told by the Court that they cannot determine the fitness or qualifications of those who apply to them for licenses to practice law in their courts. New Hampshire and Pennsylvania are told by the Court that they cannot investigate or punish seditious activities within their borders. New York is told by the Court that it cannot prescribe standards of propriety and fitness for its teachers. North Carolina is told by the Court that it cannot determine the status of its own citizens within its own borders. Pennsylvania and the trustees of the will of Stephen Girard, who has slumbered "in the tongueless silence of the dreamless dust" for 126 years, are told by the Courts that the 14th amendment empowers the Court to write a post mortem codicil to the will which Stephen Girard made while he walked earth's surface and entertained the belief that disposing of private property by will is a matter for its owner rather than judges.

In saying these things, I am not a lone voice crying in a legal wilderness. The concurring opinion of the late Justice Robert H. Jackson in Brown v. Allen, and the resolution adopted by 36 State chief justices in Pasadena, Calif., disclose that a substantial portion of the judges and lawyers of America believe the Supreme Court is not confining itself to its allotted constitutional sphere.

I quote these words from Justice Jackson's concurring opinion: "Rightly or wrongly, the belief is widely held by the practicing profession that this Court no longer respects impersonal rules of law but is guided in these matters by personal impressions which from time to time may be shared by a majority of the justices. Whatever has been intended, this Court also has generated an impression in much of the judiciary that regard for precedents and authorities is obsolete, that words no longer mean what they have always meant to the profession, that the law knows no fixed principles." Justice Jackson closed his observations on this score with this sage comment: "I know of no way we can have equal justice under law except we have some law."

Let us consider and weigh the reasoning of those who seek to justify the proposition that it is permissible for the Supreme Court to amend the Constitution under the guise of interpreting it.

They make these assertions: The Constitution must change to meet changing conditions. As its authorized interpreter, the Supreme Court has the rightful power at all times to make the Constitution conform to the views of the majority of its members. Since the doctrine of stare decisis, i.e., the rule that judges stand by and follow the decisions of their own court, might handicap the Supreme Court in making the Constitution conform to the views of a majority of its members on some occasions, the Supreme Court is not bound by its own decisions on constitutional questions.

These arguments rest upon a wholly fallacious premise, namely, that the power to interpret and the power to amend are identical. The distinction between these powers is as wide as the gulf which yawns between Lazarus in Abraham's bosom and Dives in hell. The power to interpret the Constitution is the power to ascertain its meaning, and the power to amend the Constitution is the power to change its meaning.

It seems at first blush that those who advance these arguments overlook the significant fact that article V of the Constitution vests the power to amend the Constitution in the Congress and the States, and not in the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court. But not so, They simply nullify article V with these neat assertions:

The method of amendment authorized by article V is too cumbersome and slow. Consequently, the Supreme Court must do the amending. The alternative is to let the Constitution freeze in the pattern which one generation gave it.

To a country lawyer, this is merely a high falutin' way of saying that the oath of a Supreme Court Justice to support the Constitution does not obligate him to pay any attention to article V or any other provision displeasing to him.

When all is said, the thesis that the Supreme Court has the rightful power to amend the Constitution under the guise of interpreting it is repugnant to the end the Founding Fathers had in mind when they gave this country a written Constitution. Indeed, it is incompatible with the primary object of all law.

"The Federalist," Judge Thomas M. Cooley's monumental treatise on "Constitutional Limitation," and certain great decisions of the Supreme Court antedating the last quarter of a century, reveal with unmistakable clarity the end the Founding Fathers had in mind in giving our country a written Constitution.

The Founding Fathers "were not mere visionaries toying with speculations or theories, but practical men, dealing with the facts of political life as they understood them." (South Carolina v. United States.)

They understood the facts of political life exceedingly well. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. In consequence, they foresaw that the fundamentals of the Government they desired to establish and the liberties of the citizen they wished to secure would be put in peril in troublous times by both the Government and the people unless they protected such fundaments of government and such liberties by irrepealable law binding equally upon the Government and the governed at all times and under all circumstances. (Ex parte Milligan.)

The Founding Fathers knew that the surest way to protect the fundamentals of the Government they desired to establish and the liberties of the citizen they wished to secure was to enshrine them in a written Constitution, and thus put them beyond the control of impatient public officials, temporary majorities, and the varying moods of public opinion. To this end, they framed and adopted a written Constitution, thereby putting into form the Government they were creating and prescribing the powers that Government was to take (South Carolina v. United States; "Constitutional Limitations.")

The Founding Fathers knew that useful alterations of some provisions of the Constitution would be suggested by experience. Consequently they made provision for amendment as set out in article V. James Madison, whom historians rightly call the father of the Constitution, informs us that the Constitutional Convention preferred this mode for amending the Constitution because "it guards equally against that extreme facility, which would render the Constitution too mutable, and that extreme difficulty, which might perpetuate its discovered faults." ("The Federalist.")

Since the Constitution is a written instrument, its meaning does not alter, unless its wording is changed by amendment in the manner prescribed by article V. "That which it means when adopted it means now. * * * Those things which are within its grants of power, as those grants were understood when made, are still within them, and those things not within them remain still excluded." (South Carolina v. United States.)

Chief Justice John Marshall declared in his great opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden that "the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood * * * to have intended what they said."

This being true, it is as clear as the noonday sun that the role of the Supreme Court as the interpreter of the Constitution is simply to ascertain and give effect to the intent of its framers and the people who adopted it. (Gibbons v. Ogden; Ogden v. Saunders; Lake County v. Rollins.) As Justice Miller said in ex parte Bain: "It is never to be forgotten that in the construction of the language of the Constitution here relied on, as indeed in all other instances where construction becomes necessary, we are to place ourselves as nearly as possible in the condition of the men who framed that instrument."

Since the meaning of a written Constitution is fixed when it is adopted and is not different at any subsequent time when a court has occasion to pass upon it, Judge Cooley was justified in declaring in his "Constitutional Limitations" that "a court * * * which should allow a change in public sentiment to influence it in giving a written constitution a construction not warranted by the intention of its founders would be justly chargeable with reckless disregard of official oath and public duty."

I know that in recurring to fundamental principles I lay myself open to the charge that I am setting the clock back. As one who believes truth to be eternal, I am not troubled by this charge. Moreover, I have observed that the charge is usually made by those who labor under the delusion that there was little, if any, wisdom on earth before they arrived. It was a wise man and not a wag who suggested that these persons object to setting the clock back because it would require them to adjust their clocks and their minds forward.

Let us reflect at this point on the primary object of all law.

Laws are designed to furnish rules of conduct for government and people. As a consequence, a law is destitute of value unless it has sufficient stability to afford reliable rules to govern the conduct of government and people, and unless it can be found with reasonable certainty in established legal precedents. Justice Louis D. Brandeis had this truth in mind when he said: "It is usually more important that a rule of law be settled, than that it be settled right. Even where the error in declaring the rule is a matter of serious concern, it is ordinarily better to seek correction by legislation."

If the thesis that a majority of the members of the Supreme Court have the rightful power to change the meaning of the Constitution under the guise of interpreting it every time a sitting Justice wavers in mind or a newly appointed Justice ascends the Bench should find permanent acceptance, the Constitution would become to all practical intents and purposes an uncertain and unstable document of no beneficial value to the country. Yea, more than this, it would become a constant menace to sound government at all levels, and to the freedom of the millions of Americans who are not at liberty to join Supreme Court Justices in saying that Supreme Court decisions on constitutional questions are not binding on them.

I cannot forbear expressing my opinion that the notion that Supreme Court Justices are not bound by the decisions of the Court on constitutional questions exalts Supreme Court Justices above all other men, and is of the stuff of which judicial oligarchies are made. Be this as it may, what Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo said in "The Nature of the Judicial Process" concerning the contention that the judge is always privileged to substitute his individual sense of justice for rules of law applies with equal force to this notion. "That might result in a benevolent despotism if the judges were benevolent men. It would put an end to the reign of law."

What I have said on this point finds full support in the ringing words of Edward Douglas White, one of the ablest lawyers and wisest judges ever to grace the Supreme Court bench. He said: "In the discharge of its function of interpreting the Constitution, this Court exercises an august power. * * * It seems to me that the accomplishment of its lofty mission can only be secured by the stability of its teachings and the sanctity which surrounds them. * * * The fundamental conception of a judicial body is that of one hedged about by precedents which are binding on the Court without regard to the personality of its members. Break down this belief in judicial continuity, and let it be felt that on great constitutional questions this Court is to depart from the settled conclusions of its predecessors, and to determine them all according to the mere opinion of those who temporarily fill its bench, and our Constitution will, in my judgment, be bereft of value and become a most dangerous instrument to the rights and liberties of the people."

What has been said does not deny to the Supreme Court the power to overrule a prior decision in any instance where proper judicial restraint justifies such action. A sound criterion for determining when proper judicial restraint justifies a judge in overruling a precedent is to be found in the standard which Judge Learned Hand says his friend and colleague, Judge Thomas Swan, set for his own guidance: "He will not overrule a precedent unless he can be satisfied beyond peradventure that it was untenable when made; and not even then, if it has gathered around it the support of a substantial body of decisions based on it."

In ending this phase of my remarks, I wish to emphasize the precedents set by the Supreme Court on constitutional questions were tenable when made if they conformed to the intention of those who framed and adopted the constitutional provisions involved, no matter how inconsistent they may be with the views of Justices subsequently ascending the bench.

This brings me to the argument that Supreme Court Justices must nullify article V and usurp the power to amend the Constitution while pretending to interpret it to keep the Constitution from freezing in the pattern which one generation gave it.

I assert with all the emphasis at my command that there is really no substantial vadidity in this argument. I take this position for three reasons:

First. Although the Constitution does not change its meaning in the absence of amendment under article V, the provisions of the Constitution are pliable in the sense that they reach into the future and embrace all new conditions falling within the scope of the powers which they in terms confer. (Missouri P. R. Co. v. United States; South Carolina v. United States.) Existing grants of constitutional powers will enable the Federal Government to take action in virtually all new fields in which action on its part will be appropriate.

Second. As the possessor of all the legislative power of the Federal Government, Congress has complete authority at all times to make, amend, or repeal laws relating to all matters committed by the Constitution to the Federal Government.

Third. For these reasons, occasions which really call for amendments to the Constitution are comparatively rare. While it is frequently asserted that the method for amending the Constitution prescribed by article V is too cumbersome and slow for practical purposes, those who make the assertion furnish no satisfactory proof of its truth. To be sure, they cite as evidence the failure of Congress and the States to make constitutional changes they deem desirable. They overlook the fact, however, that the evidence they cite has just as logical a tendency to prove that the wisdom of Congress and the States exceeds theirs. Thomas Riley Marshall said that "it is as easy to amend the Constitution of the United States as it used to be to draw a cork." While this statement is not literally true, it is substantially true in instances where Congress and the States believe a constitutional amendment to be advisable.

In the final analysis, those who contend that Supreme Court Justices are justified in changing the meaning of constitutional provisions while pretending to interpret them confuse right and power.

What Justice Cardozo said of the judge as a legislation, in "The Nature of the Judicial Process," is relevant here.

He said: "I think the difficulty has its origin in the failure to distinguish between right and power, between the command embodied in a judgment and the jural principle to which the obedience of the judge is due. Judges have, of course, the power though not the right to ignore the mandate of a statute, and render judgment in despite of it. They have the power, though not the right, to travel beyond the walls of the interstices, the bounds set to judicial innovation by precedent and custom. Nonetheless, by that abuse of power, they violate the law."

Twenty years ago a great American, William E. Borah, a Senator from Idaho, made this moving statement:

"We do not know what the future has in store for us as a nation, but do know that the system of government which was brought forth on this continent nearly 150 years ago, baptized with the blessings and crowned with the wisdom of great leaders, has brought greater contentment and prosperity and more freedom to the average man and women than any form of government yet devised. This fact alone should burn into our very souls the determination to preserve it in all its essential principles. It is one thing to adopt and adjust principles to new conditions; it is another thing to permit new conditions to disregard principles; the former is the highest achievement of the statesman and the lawgiver, the latter the work of the timeserver and the adventurer."

In closing, I add this observation to Senator Borah's stirring words: We shall not preserve any of the essential principles of the Government which brought these great blessings to America if we permit the Constitution to be destroyed by judicial usurpation.

Public Housing and the Federal Budget

OF
HON. JOHN TABER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a balanced budget is the most critical goal which must be attained in this session of Congress. It is up to Congress, but here is a picture of just what makes this goal so difficult to reach.

The Constitution provides that no moneys be withdrawn from the Treasury of the United States without an appropriation authorized by law. For the last 20 years, it has been customary for several congressional committees to draft legislation providing for a so-called back-door approach to the Treasury, instead of going to the Congress and asking for an appropriation when said legislation calls for money to be spent for any purpose. This is done with a provision which authorizes the head of an agency, like the Housing Agency, to go to the Secretary of the Treasury, deliver to him a note or notes for whatever amount they might wish to draw, and apply it against the total sum which is made available by the bill. With such a provision, an agency can use the money without restraint, and can do just about as it wishes with it. The agency is not required either annually or at any other time, to go before a committee of Congress, and say what it would do with the money. There is no annual or other review provided for its operations. It is just a freelance in the spending of the money.

Clause 4 of rule XXI of the House rules provided for the solution of these problems and the appropriation of money through the Appropriations Committee. To quote the rule:

> No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, nor shall an amendment proposing an appropriation be in order during the consideration of a bill or joint resolution reported by a committee not having that jurisdiction. A question of order on an appropriation in any such bill, joint resolution, or amendment thereto may be raised at any time.

This has been interpreted in several parliamentary rulings in the House of Representatives over the past 15 or 20 years in such a way that congressional committees other than the Appropriations Committee could bring in a bill with a provision for the back-door approach to the Treasury, such as I have described, and as a result of it, we have had a tremendous amount of irresponsible legislation. Over $5 billion was appropriated last year by the Congress through the back-door method. Congressman HOWARD W. SMITH, of Virginia, has introduced a resolution, which is now up for consideration before the Rules Committee, which resolution would do away with this practice and force those people who have been avoiding a proper justification for withdrawing money from the Treasury to come before the Appropriations Committee for their money.

Conditions have come to pass where there has been no review of a lot of these Federal expenditures. It is absolutely necessary if we are going to maintain the liberties of the United States that we keep in the Appropriations Committee of the Congress the power to appropriate funds. If we allow legislation to continue to make provisions such as the recent housing bill passed by the Senate; namely, to turn over $3.7 billion to the Public Housing Administration to spend on public housing without any restrictions whatever and without any control and without any review over the 5½ years that is the period covered by the authority written into the bill, the Congress is simply shirking its responsibilities. Time after time, we find cases where expenditures have been made and will be made that the Congress did not approve and that the very people who are urging this type of legislation did not approve themselves. For instance, there is no control in the housing legislation as to what sort of construction there should be; there is no such thing as an attempt to maintain a good, clean job. The housing bill, as it presently is before the House committee, calls for $1.5 billion for urban renewal, $3.7 billion for housing, $400 million for college housing loans, and for veterans' housing, $300 million. The Founding Fathers who drew the Constitution, after having gone through a long period of war with Great Britain to obtain their liberties, thought that it was necessary to place a provision in the Constitution prohibiting the spending of money without an appropriation. When there is no appropriation of money, frankly, it appears to me as though the language was not sufficient to comply with the Constitution requirement for the proper appropriation of funds. With that in mind, Congressman SMITH has prepared and has before the Rules Committee House Resolution 161. It would require that these funds should pass through the Appropriations Committee, after being authorized by other committees by bills coming from them. It would require an annual review of what is going to be spent and what it is going to be spent for. We must protect our people from what is going on through a bloc of bureaucrats. Surely, that would save more money than any other action that we could take at this time. This resolution is the only way to restore to Congress the power to appropriate money given it by the Constitution.

These various projects—the public housing construction program where buildings are erected and rented to people who have incomes as high as $10,000 a year—are probably the most ridiculous of our governmental expenditures. The rents that these people pay are calculated to just above cover the cost of the maintenance of the buildings and the accessories. They do not pay a substantial amount into the Treasury. They pay no taxes upon the buildings and we are taxing the poor people who have been thrifty enough to buy and pay for their own houses, to pay for the cost and maintenance of these public housing projects.

Many of these property owners have less income than the people who are living in these public houses, and if there is any project whatever that we could get along without, this is it.

The urban renewal projects and the college housing projects and the veterans loan project can be taken care of by local and private capital, if the proper efforts are made to provide that sort of thing.

Somewhere, somehow, there must come a sense of responsibility and of meeting our obligations to the Government of the United States; to the necessity for keeping down our Federal budget so that we can prevent any more outbreaks of the inflation which has plagued the United States terrifically since the end of World War II.

Hoosier Guardsmen Defend Lives and Homes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. BRAY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, a few months ago, the National Guard of the United States introduced a slogan which reads: "Sleep well tonight, your National Guard is awake." This slogan seemed most appropriate to those of us who appreciate the important role the Guard plays in our Nation's defense picture, for we realize that without these thousands of citizen soldiers our manpower problem would indeed be critical.

Though this slogan was undoubtedly conceived to dramatize the Guard's important position in defending our country, it carries an implication in Indiana that brings it much closer to Hoosier hearts and homes.

For it was National Guardsmen who, day and night, worked and fought to help control the rampaging ice and water of the flooding Wabash River. Called from their own homes and families, from their civilian occupations, these Hoosier Guardsmen built dikes of sandbags, they evacuated stranded families, they literally moved small communities to safety.

When they were called, they moved quickly and without confusion. There was no question about rations, about transportation, about equipment, or anything else. They were ready and they were trained.

Every one of us—and every freedom loving citizen of this country—should thank God for the National Guard. We can sleep well because the National Guard is awake. Just ask the families along the Wabash River Valley.

Speech Delivered by Hon. Lister Hill, of Alabama, at the Dedication of the National Education Association Headquarters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama delivered a remarkable speech at the dedication of the National Education Association headquarters in Washington, D.C., on February 10, 1959. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

I was present at the dedication of the National Education Association headquarters and heard Senator HILL deliver his speech. The Senate has heard him speak many times on the floor of the Senate, and many of us have heard him in other forums. He always speaks eloquently and well. However, as I heard the distinguished Senator from Alabama speak before the delegates to the National Education Association on the educational problems of our country I thought that it was one of his finest speeches. The subject itself related to defense, the economic growth of the Nation, the necessity of our citizens being prepared to participate fully in democratic government, and to our basic concept of the full development of man.

The speech of the Senator from Alabama was philosophical, practical, and eloquent. It is a call for thought and action by our Government both at the local and Federal levels, and by the people of our Nation. It is a statement of permanent value for the people of our country.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BY HON. LISTER HILL, OF ALABAMA, AT THE DEDICATION OF NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION HEADQUARTERS, WASHINGTON, D.C., FEBRUARY 10, 1959

Dr. Givens, Mr. Secretary, Commissioner Derthick, Dr. Carr, officers, and friends of the National Education Association and of American education, it is an honor to be with you today to take part in the dedication of this magnificent building, the new headquarters for the National Education Association.

Impressive as is this fine new building, is the record of splendid service that NEA has rendered during the past century to the teachers, to education, and to the people of America.

As NEA begins its second century of service, it is fitting that these handsome new quarters become the home of the efficient and busy nerve center of the largest professional organization in the world.

I know the many services to your 700,000 members, the information and guidance you give to the teachers of the Nation to help them advance their professional competence and improve their economic status. I know your efforts to improve American education.

As your organization has worked to advance the cause of education on all fronts, your greatest fight has been made for educational opportunity for every American child.

Today, as your executive secretary and my friend, Dr. William G. Carr, has so aptly put it: "We have been concerned that every child get into school. Now we must ask what every child gets out of school."

The responsibilities of education have never been better summed up than in the blunt phrase of Thomas Jefferson:

"If a nation expects to be ignorant and free in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be."

America is challenged as never before by a ruthless, ambitious Communist Russia that has deliberately geared its education system to take advantage of the emerging new age of science, with massive and ever-increasing demands for more trained manpower and for new skills and techniques, with a premium upon intellectual excellence, and with its demand for devotion to the hard labor of rigorous thought.

America's traditional values of the dignity, the essential worth, and the inalienable rights of the individual are challenged by the Communist concept of the all-powerful state, where the individual is simply the tool of the state.

Our religious and cultural heritage is challenged by a society of dynamic, atheistic materialism.

Our system of economic opportunity through free enterprise and individual initiative faces driving competition from a regimented economy whose resources are used as political and diplomatic weapons.

Our science and technology are challenged and have been presently surpassed by sputnik, lunik, and other evidence of Russia's amazing scientific progress within a single generation.

And hanging darkly over all is the ominous possibility of nuclear war.

What are the resources of our people—resources of the mind and of the spirit—for meeting the challenge of a dynamic and ruthless Communist Russia, and the challenge of a swiftly changing world?

At the very roots of our resources and our capabilities lies America's system of education. Education provides not only the knowledge and technical training, but the intellectual discipline and incentives for meeting the challenge. In our democracy, education has a vast responsibility for instilling the patriotism, the sense of duty, the moral commitment to make a choice, to work in the cause of justice and human liberty. For well we know the uncommitted mind leads to the cynicism and decadence of the uncommitted heart.

The successful launching of Russia's sputniks struck a severe blow at the self-confidence of the American people and at our prestige in the world. Rarely have Americans questioned one another so intensively about our military posture, our scientific stature, and our educational system. In the wave of reproach and criticism that has swept America a principal target has been our system of education.

American education, it is charged, is obsessed with the teaching of "social adjustment," with gearing education to the lowest common denominator, with pressing America's children into an educational lockstep that moves them from grade to grade without regard for individual talents and capacities.

Some of these charges are true. For some time, you and I have been concerned over the vastly increased number of nonacademic courses in the secondary schools. We have been concerned that English language and literature have been diluted; that physics and chemistry have become general science; that algebra has become general mathematics. We have been concerned that education does not demand the rigorous effort, the mental discipline, the creative thinking, and the respect for learning that American education must have.

But education in America is not determined by the educators and the teachers alone. Education in America reflects the attitudes of a whole people. Our educational programs are determined by:

The businessman, the labor leader, the banker, and the mother who sit on the local school board;

By the industrialist whose factories provide jobs in the community and thereby influence the kind of education provided to fill those jobs;

By parents whose indulgence or whose desire for material success, prestige, and good incomes for their children shape so deeply the child's sense of values and his selection of courses;

By Government—Federal, State, and local—through the administrative agencies and the legislatures, through the funds they provide and the limitations and requirements they impose;

By the foundations and the philanthropists, in the types of grants and endowments they give; and

By the newspapers, radio and television, and the Nation's other mass communications media, as they contribute to public opinion and public attitudes.

It is fitting and proper that all these segments of American democracy play their rightful part in determining the shape and emphasis and function of American education. But when we come to assess the needs and deficiencies of American education, they should stand up and be counted and accept their share of the responsibility. The burden must not be put solely on the educators and the teachers, many of whom are dedicated men and women who give their lives to teaching, who, in their devotion and self-sacrifice, spend and are spent in the cause of educating America's children.

It is important to remember that our aim is to attack the problem, not the schools. Criticism and difference of opinion help to clear the air, but they are only part of the process of decision. Criticism is a measure of our desire for excellence, but it does not alone achieve excellence.

In the words of John Milton, "Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much argument, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making."

We must not permit criticism to destroy our faith in the essential value, the proven success, and the democratic validity of our American school system—the great training ground for democracy. Are we to be made self-doubters by our aspirations and ideals?

What, then, is the American, this new man, who has made the deserts bloom, who has taken the drudgery out of farming and removed the backbreaking toil from factory labor, whose productivity per worker is by far the highest there is, who is surrounded by the world's best systems of communication and transportation, and who enjoys the highest standard of living in the world?

Was this progress made by a people with an inferior educational system?

There are some who look with trepidation on the incoming flood of school and college students that will double the present school population by 1970. There are some who feel this greatly increasing school population endangers the quality of American education. We need not feel besieged by the rising tide of students. Their claims to education are a sign of national health and vitality. Their millions constitute a national asset—a vast reservoir of skills and ambition and intellect. From so broad a base we can discover and develop the most talented young intellects.

In the last session of Congress—with the enactment of the National Defense Education Act—we took a major step for discovering and encouraging the Nation's potential intellectual talent, for creating wider opportunities for advanced training of our gifted young people, for providing better training and equipment for our teachers.

The principal objective of the National Defense Education Act is to help correct the serious imbalance in our educational system that for some years has been unfavorable to the teaching of mathematics, the sciences and foreign languages. Student loans at low interest rates and fellowship grants for advanced study give the able and qualified student an opportunity to complete his education and give the Nation the benefit of his maximum capabilities. Teachers may attend special institutes where they can learn the newest developments in their fields of study. Aptitude tests will reveal talented pupils at an early age. Guidance and counseling services will help students select the paths of study best suited to their individual capacities.

The act provides for research and experimentation into new uses for radio, television, films, and other teaching aids. Language centers are provided to give instruction in the language and culture of foreign peoples.

Expansion of area vocational educational schools will help provide the technicians so vitally needed to support the Nation's scientists and engineers. The latest findings of scientific research throughout the world will be assembled and translated.

As the National Defense Education Act strengthens America's education in mathematics, the sciences and languages, we must move to strengthen our whole educational system. The need for mobilizing our intellectual resources has been dramatized chiefly by the shortage of scientists and engineers. But this deficiency is only part of a general shortage of specialized talent which affects virtually every aspect of our society and the strength of our America. We need more of every kind of talent, not merely more nuclear physicists and engineers, but more first rate biologists and doctors, teachers and politicians, economists and ministers, writers, poets, and philosophers—and leaders in all the varied activities that make up our national life. And this calls for total effort from the Nation.

In this effort, we recognize that the primary and basic responsibility for and the control and administration of our educational system, sensitive to the needs and desires of the people, rests with the States, the local communities and their college and universities. In enacting the National Defense Education Act, Congress reaffirmed this principle and the act declares:

"The Congress reaffirms the principle and declares that the States and local communities have and must retain control over and primary responsibility for public education."

In this effort, we recognize that education is a total responsibility of the Nation and that the Federal Government has primarily a twofold duty in American education: To strengthen the intellectual resources of our people to meet the needs of national security; to help relieve the disparities in the wealth of the individual States which impose an undue burden on the less wealthy States in their efforts to maintain adequate education programs. Assistance from the Federal Government should stimulate and encourage and challenge State and local action and never be a substitute for such action.

There are great disparities in the wealth of the States, and consequently in their ability to raise revenue and to support adequate educational programs.

It is axiomatic to say that taxes can be levied only where wealth exists. The disparity in taxable wealth between States is dramatically pointed out in a pamphlet prepared by Prof. R. L. Johns, of the University of Florida, and published last year by the NEA legisaltive commission. In this pamphlet, entitled "Ability and Effort of the States to Support the Public Schools," Dr. Johns showed that in 1955 the concentration of taxable wealth in five great industrial and commercial States—Illinois, Michigan, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania—was so great that over 60 percent of the total U.S. corporation income and profits taxes were raised in these States, although they have less than 30 percent of the school-age children of this country to educate. On the other hand, Dr. Johns points out that 21 nonindustrial and noncommercial States, having roughly the same number of children to educate, have taxable wealth which produced only slightly more than 8 percent of the corporation income and profits taxes of the United States. To put it another way, these five great industrial States have many times more the tax collecting possibilities than exist in the 21 nonindustrial and noncommercial States.

In our concern with sputniks, with rising enrollments, with the teaching potential of television and other mass communications media, we must not forget that the teacher is the central figure in the education process.

Inevitably the qualities and influence of the teacher are woven into the character of the Nation. We entrust the minds and characters of our most precious resource—our children—to the teacher for many hours of the day. We look to the teacher to help mold the child for the responsibilities of manhood and womanhood.

Teaching has for a long time been called a profession. It is time to make it a profession in fact.

The hour demands a bill of rights for the teacher, a bill of rights guaranteeing a salary that will enable the teacher to enjoy a good standard of living, permit recreation and travel, continued study and educational growth, and insure security in old age.

The bill of rights must go further. It must recognize the essential worth and dignity of the teacher and assure him of full opportunity to take part in the life of the community, outside the classroom.

But a bill of rights for the teacher is not self-enforcing. To become reality, such a bill of rights requires public understanding and public support. There must be a new consciousness by the public and by State and local officials of their obligations. You, the teachers, must inform the public of your needs and the needs of the schools.

I know that you have organized the citizenship committee of the National Education Association, and it has been an active, aggressive organization. Yet a recent survey by NEA revealed that two-thirds of the teachers in the United States felt a kind of pride in being aloof from politics and public affairs.

You cannot fulfill your obligations as teachers and as citizens by standing apart. Perhaps more than others, you have an opportunity—through your teaching and through your active example—to serve as a constructive and influential force in public affairs.

We stand today at one of the great watersheds of history. It is a commonplace that they are seldom noted until, looking back, we see them rising out of what Tennyson called "the eternal landscape of the past." Our generation can realize, in awe and humility, that we have been permitted the rare experience of crossing an epochal divide into a new valley of civilization.

To meet the challenge of this new epoch, to reap the rich harvest of its promises, we shall need unwavering determination and a burning resolve to reach the new heights demanded of us.

More than any other kind of society, democracy requires talent and leadership, widespread among all the people. The goal of our educational system must be the opportunity and the incentive for the fullest exercise of each individual's ability. America's strength requires that we have a people who hold a deep respect for education and intellectual attainment, who recognize that intellectual discipline is essential to our national purpose, who know the hard labor of intensive study and devoted, rigorous thought.

But for our people to meet the challenge of the Communist world, for them to measure up to the demands of the hour, the answer lies not alone in learning, and in such wisdom as they may acquire.

The foundation of the whole matter lies in the character of our people.

The great task of American education is to build this character, to instill the ideals and the faith to know what is right, and to instill the courage and resolution to choose to work and to fight for it.

Let us build upon the rock of the commandment of Joshua to his troops: "Choose you this day whom ye will serve; as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

New Challenges to Education

OF
HON. RALPH YARBOROUGH
OF TEXAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, it was recently my pleasure and privilege to address the Texas breakfast at the National School Administrators convention held in Atlantic City, N.J.

The school administrators of this Nation are a most important group. To them and the teachers under their supervision falls the vital task of training the youth of the United States. The excellent record they have already established stands as a living monument to their skill and dedication to duty, particularly when we consider they have been forced to work with inadequate facilities and are generally underpaid. To remain at their posts and continue to work for the betterment of young people requires a missionary zeal. These people are to be heartily commended.

At the request of friends, I am asking unanimous consent to have my address, given February 17, 1959, printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW CHALLENGES TO EDUCATION

(Address by U.S. Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH at the annual Texas breakfast at the National Association of School Administrators convention, Atlantic City, N.J., February 17, 1959)

Mr. Chairman, fellow Texans, fellow Americans, I am very grateful for the privilege of participating in your annual meeting. This is a doubly pleasurable meeting to me, because some of the happiest days of my life have been spent in school—most of them as a student under inspiring teachers.

Although some of my former students in the Piney Woods country of the Neches River Valley may feel differently about those times, my 3 years as a country schoolteacher in Henderson County were to me some of the happiest days of all.

Now, as a member of the Senate Education Subcommittee, I am having an exceptional opportunity to learn something of the many complex problems facing our schools today.

In common with most informed Americans, I am deeply concerned about the lagging progress of public education and I am particularly concerned about it in Texas. This does not mean that I am critical of you and of our teachers. On the contrary, I commend you for doing an excellent job despite limited tools, inadequate pay, and lukewarm public support. It is my job, and the responsibility of every thinking citizen, to do everything possible to see that you have the funds to pay adequate teachers' salaries and to build adequate classrooms.

I firmly believe that teachers' pay in Texas should be raised from 50 percent to 100 percent, but not because I feel that every teacher is worth twice as much as he or she is now receiving. I am convinced that doubling teacher pay would not only solve the teacher shortage, it would create competition for the jobs. Then you as administrators would be in position to demand a high degree of excellence in this vital profession.

To those who say we "can't afford it," my answer is—we cannot afford to do otherwise. Like it or not, we cannot afford either having only half of our Texans educated, or having all Texans half educated. Yet, we are dangerously near that point.

Only one Texan in three over the age of 25 years has completed 4 years of high school. Texans rank 38th among people from all the States in the percentage qualified through the selective service mental test. Likewise, our students rank 38th among the students of other States in the per capita average number of days they attend school each year, under Texas' generally unenforceable compulsory school attendance law.

It is a shocking disgrace for big, rich Texas to rank 32d among the States in public school expenditures for each pupil in average daily attendance. But one must confess that is what might be expected in a State where an inept Government is blind to the needs of education. It taxed students by raising university tuition fees, and refused to tax the interests that are exploiting Texas, her people, and her resources.

A century and a quarter ago, our Texas forefathers revolted because of the failure of the general government to establish a public system of education in Texas.

Texas was ravaged by fire and by sword, her cities besieged, her towns burned, her heroes killed. But her right to a system of public education was won. Are we, the inheritors of those rights, to fail this, and the next generation? Are we too weak, too conformist, too servile and supine, to fight for what we know is right? Is big money to connote big ignorance? I call on every Texan to rally now, and help us build the best system of public education in the United States.

Proud, wealthy Texas is paying its elementary teachers an average of only $4,296 yearly, considerably below the national average. This is criminal neglect because the student is the casualty in the long run. As your representative in the Senate, I am working for the solution of this problem.

As a member of the Senate Education Subcommittee, I have been present at hearings on Senate bill No. 2, the so-called School Support Act of 1959 introduced by Senator MURRAY, of Montana. Under this provision, Texas would be eligible to receive an allotment of $25 per school age child in fiscal 1959–60, $50 the next year, $75 the next year, and $100 per student in 1962–63. The estimated allotments for Texas by respective year would total $63.8 million; $132.9 million, $206.4 million, and $285.3 million.

This money, and I want to emphasize this—without any Federal controls or intervention—would be available to local school districts to use as local boards see fit, either for teacher pay increases or construction of new school rooms, or both.

Regardless of whether this bill passes, you can count on me to fight to see that we do not lose any of the good programs already underway. I will continue to strenuously oppose moves to abolish or to limit the school-lunch program, and the school-milk program, vocational education programs, and Federal assistance to federally impacted areas. I am working to expand all of these programs. You know, some of these people who are against spending money on public education, no matter why or where the money is needed, have been running around the State saying, "Why you've got to watch out for old RALPH YARBOROUGH. He's for Federal aid to education."

I'd like to clear that point up once and for all. I'm not just for Federal aid to education. I'm for all aid to education. The soundest investment we can make in America is in developing the minds of our young people. The need for more funds in the field of public education is so critical that revenues from local districts, cities, States, and the Federal Government all are required.

With this in mind, I have been shocked and saddened to learn that the board of regents of our Texas State teachers colleges have declined by an official resolution to participate in the student loan provisions of the National Defense Education Act of 1958. As you know, this is the act which primarily is designed to start us on the road to higher educational achievement, particularly in the field of science.

One provision of the National Defense Education Act of 1958, which, incidentally, I had the honor of coauthoring, provides funds for loans to college students. Most colleges in Texas and throughout the Nation have responded enthusiastically to this loan program as a very worthwhile means of assisting worthy students in securing a college education. But I was astonished to learn that the board of regents of Texas State teachers colleges have denied participation in these loans to students in five colleges.

Despite the fact that college officials had estimated a student loan need totaling $195,333, the board saw fit to deny this loan program to students at Sam Houston Teachers College, Southwest Texas State Teachers College, Stephen F. Austin, East Texas State, and Sul Ross College.

The board of regents of these colleges has made a decision which I would not want on my conscience. If a single student drops out of a single one of these schools for lack of funds, the regents should be held accountable. Ironically, one of the colleges which the regents prohibited from participating in the loan program has this statement of purpose printed on its letterhead: "Founded to promote the advancement of the profession of teaching. Dedicated to the cause of better schools. Devoted to the welfare of children and youth."

It is my sincere hope that the board of regents of Texas State teachers colleges, for the good of the students, will reconsider its position on this matter: A total of $21,758 has been reserved for the five colleges involved. If the regents finally deny this aid to their students, I shall make every effort to see that these funds are apportioned to other Texas students in other schools so that they will not be diverted to other States.

In my opinion, the people who make the mistake of opposing the granting of sufficient funds for the Nation's educational program are doing this country, themselves, and particularly our children, one of the greatest injustices of which they are capable.

Basically, the cold war now raging between democracy and communism around the world is a struggle for the minds of men. Enlightenment has always been free men's bulwark against tyranny. Education is the foundation stone of democracy, and it is an ever-increasing factor in the standard of living each man and his family can enjoy. We cannot, we must not, and we will not continue to deny all our students an education of the first class.

It would be simpler if I could say at this point, "Well, we are going to help you get some money, and that will solve the educational problems in America in general, and in Texas in particular."

But it isn't that simple. The educational problem facing us all goes much deeper than money. The thing we need most in education cannot be bought with money; it must grow again in the hearts and minds of the American people. I refer to the once proud dream that this land would be the world's model of universal educational attainment and cultural development. I refer to the spirit which made a backwoods boy named Abraham Lincoln study by firelight because he and other young people of his time recognized that knowledge is an invaluable stepping stone to happiness and to greatness.

What has become of the insatiable and inexorable quest for knowledge which played such a dominant role in pioneering of our Nation? Does it exist no more? Is a penchant for a bebop ducktail culture a passing fad, or evidence of the long decline?

As a people we have more time free from work and drudgery than any other people in the history of mankind. But are we Americans using this time, even a small portion of this free time, to improve our minds through new educational attainment or even serious thought?

The answer is all too obvious. We have become a Nation with its head stuck in a television set; a people establishing new records annually in the consumption of alcohol and happy pills. We spend our lives vainly searching for happiness from a bottle. We are more concerned with the tearful soap opera TV heroine than with Communist terror in Hungary.

This is a deadly trend. As Adlai Stevenson has said: "We have confused the free with the free and easy." We threaten to become a people whose principal purpose is piling up profits and partaking of fleeting pleasures.

In the words of Abraham Lincoln, "We cannot escape history. * * * We will be remembered in spite of ourselves. No personal significance or insignificance can spare one or the other of us. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down, in honor or dishonor, to the latest generation."

There must be an awakening. As a people and a Nation we cannot afford to retire in the prime of our lives. We have reached what might be considered a breathing point in American history. But our indolence and vacuity and indifference cannot continue. This breathing point must not become a permanent campsite. Let us adopt as a national educational aim the motto of an American State "Ad astra per aspera," "To the stars through difficulties."

We must recapture our desire for high educational excellence, and unflinchingly meet the mental disciplines and hard work basic to superior knowledge.

Mass education of all the people, once an American monopoly, is fast coming to the whole world. We can maintain our leadership only by moving faster and working harder for educational progress than other countries now turning their efforts to mass education.

The parent, the teacher, and the politician must all make up their minds that easy courses, little discipline, and stinted funds for education will never add up to high educational standards. Major emphasis on athletic spectacles and academic trivia cannot produce a high percentage of well-educated citizens. It is more likely to produce mediocrity.

We must turn from mediocrity to educational excellence, not only in pursuit of happiness for more Americans, but to achieve educational superiority.

Never before in the history of man have the talents and the specially developed abilities of educated men been in more urgent demand. Never have the opportunities for educated, thinking, freemen been so great. The next 10, 20, or 30 years will tell whether this Nation produces the large numbers of high caliber citizens it so needs.

The brunt of the burden is on your shoulders. Those of us in public service can assist in the work of making known the need, and by helping to make funds available. But the real job of turning out young men and women who are intellectually prepared to be responsible Americans is up to you.

Upon the success or failure of your mission may well rest the eventual fate of freemen everywhere.

I wish you Godspeed.

Diversion of Water of Lake Michigan

OF

HON. WILLIAM PROXMIRE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, Tuesday I appeared before the House Public Works Committee in opposition to the Chicago water bill. I ask unanimous consent that my statement before that committee be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILLIAM PROXMIRE, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1959, BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

H.R. 1 should be rejected because in the 6 years this kind of measure has been before the Congress there has never been a showing that the study which is the only authorized purpose of this bill is necessary.

The study is unnecessary for these reasons:

1. The Corps of Engineers has already testified (pp. 193, 194, in hearings before Senate Public Works Committee, July 19, 28, 29, and August 7, 1958) that they are fully satisfied that additional diversion will not improve navigation on the Illinois waterway, and will have an adverse effect on navigation on the Great Lakes (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 2, p. 19532). In 6 years of consideration there has never been a showing that a study would contribute any useful information to a better understanding of navigation consequences. I challenge the author to show that this bill would provide any useful information on navigation although the effect on navigation is the only stated purpose of the bill.

2. The Corps of Engineers has also testified to certain knowledge of the effect of additional diversion on power generation—that it would be favorable at Lockport but far more unfavorable on the St. Lawrence—with a total net loss of power. There is no indication in 6 years of consideration that the study authorized in this bill would contribute even one fact necessary to a better understanding of the consequences of diversion on power. Again I challenge the author to show that this bill would provide such information.

3. The only remaining purpose the study authorized in this bill could serve is the effect of additional diversion on sanitation. Although similar study bills have been introduced in three successive Congresses, there has never been a finding by the Public Health Service, the Illinois Board of Health, the Chicago Board of Health, any public health group of any kind, or even of a single competent or for that matter incompetent public health authority that increased diversion would be necessary for improved sanitation or public health or even desirable.

On the other hand the most competent public health survey ever made of Chicago (the Chicago and Cook County health survey by the U.S. Public Health Service) called for a series of other recommendations to improve sanitation in Chicago. It specifically considered additional diversion and failed to recommend it.

It is true that this previous study was made nearly 12 years ago. Nevertheless there have been no contrary findings by the Public Health Service since the publication of this book. It would seem to me that since improved sanitation is the only possible beneficial consequence of this bill—that the Public Health Service should be requested to furnish the Congress with a report on the public health justification, if any, for this study.

4. This bill is unnecessary because the Supreme Court has established jurisdiction over diversion by Chicago for some 50 years. Everything provided in this bill could be granted by the Supreme Court. The Court has been willing to grant Chicago temporary increases in diversion in the past. It did so as recently as 1956. It would do so again if the Court deemed such increase merited. Through the appointment of special masters the Court has built up a record of great competence in this matter. Obviously only lack of merit keeps Chicago from going to the Court for the diversion authorized in this bill.

Before the committee votes on this bill I respectfully suggest that it request the Public Health Service to indicate whether a 3-year study is necessary to provide conclusions on the consequences of additional diversion on the sanitary quality of water in the Illinois Waterway.

In the event the committee favorably considers the bill I respectfully suggest the following changes:

1. The bill calls for a recommendation from the Army only. Yet the study authorized by the bill will be entirely concerned with the sanitary quality of water on the Illinois Waterway. This is within the competence of the Public Health Service. Therefore the Public Health Service should be called on to provide its own recommendations.

2. The bill calls for a recommendation but provides no standards for judgment on which such a recommendation should be based. The Public Health Service should be asked to specify the standards that it would be necessary for additional diversion to achieve in order to warrant a favorable recommendation. In the absence of such prestated standards for favorable recommendation—the Congress is guaranteeing Chicago a favorable recommendation. The deck is being stacked in advance: The favorable-to-Chicago recommendation is inevitable. What Chicago wants is a stacked deck, a study that will provide a preconceived conclusion—a guarantee of a permanent additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet of water per second.

3. The Public Health Service should be asked to indicate whether or not a study of alternative sanitation methods to achieve comparable purification without additional diversion would be necessary to permit reasonable recommendations. A Public Health Service staff report, dated April 8, 1957, and entitled "Estimated Costs of Treatment Measures Equivalent to Increased Diversion of Lake Michigan Water for Sanitation Purposes at Chicago" was submitted at the request of the Bureau of the Budget on April 29, 1957. The report was submitted to Roger W. Jones, Assistant Director for Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget, by Marion B. Folsom, then Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

This staff report indicated that its information was based on limited data. On two of the four alternatives the Public Health Service declared that they were not in a position to estimate the effectiveness. The cost estimates are at variance with firm estimates made by the president of the Metropolitan Sanitary District of Chicago. The Chicago estimates are substantially lower. The head of the sanitation district himself states that the cost of one of the alternatives to diversion "would not be beyond the ability of the sanitary district." The Public Health Service concludes its staff study by declaring of another alternative, "Its use for reducing oxygen demand may be economically justified and found effective in meeting the unusual conditions at Chicago either alone or in combination with other approaches." If either of these conclusions should prove to be the case, they would in my judgment demolish any reason for consideration of diversion by Chicago.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Milwaukee, Wis., Common Council has recently adopted a resolution declaring the opposition of our largest city to this water diversion proposal. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Common Council of the City of Milwaukee be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION DECLARING CITY OF MILWAUKEE OPPOSITION TO WATER DIVERSION PROPOSALS

Whereas by prior resolutions, this common council has recorded the position of the city of Milwaukee in opposition to proposals for diversion of water from Lake Michigan for the purposes of the Chicago Sanitary District; and

Whereas there is pending before the Congress of the United States bills to authorize additional diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago; and

Whereas one of these bills is H.R. 1, introduced in the House of Representatives January 7, 1959: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Common Council of the City of Milwaukee, as follows:

1. That the city of Milwaukee reiterates its position in opposition to increased or unreasonable diversion of water from Lake Michigan for the purposes of the Chicago Sanitary District, or comparable diversions of water elsewhere in the Great Lakes Basin; and

2. That the mayor, the deputy city attorney, and the municipal port director be and they are hereby authorized and directed to appear before congressional committees either in the House of Representatives or in the U.S. Senate holding hearings in Washington or elsewhere, and to express the opposition of the city of Milwaukee to legislation which would in any manner authorize the diversion of additional volumes of water from the Great Lakes Basin; and

3. That the city of Milwaukee hereby specifically declares its opposition to H.R. 1 pending before the Congress of the United States, or bills similar in intent; and

4. That the aforesaid persons enumerated in paragraph 2 are hereby authorized to confer with representatives of Great Lakes cities of Canada for the purpose of discussing matters pertaining to water diversion, and they are also authorized to meet with other representatives of the principal cities of the Great Lakes area in the United States for the purpose of discussing opposition to water diversion legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the city clerk to the President of the United States, to the Committee on Public Works, U.S. Senate, and to the appropriate committee of the House of Representatives; to Senators and Representatives from the State of Wisconsin; to the attorneys general of the Great Lakes States opposing water diversion; to the Great Lakes Harbors Association; to the Great Lakes Compact Commission; and to the Lake Carriers Association; and that the city representatives herein enumerated be authorized to collaborate with the legislators and regional groups designated with a view to achieving collaboration and effective opposition to any and all proposals for extraction of water from the Great Lakes Basin; to the injury of the port cities and the maritime interests of the Great Lakes.

Washington Report

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newsletter of February 21, 1959:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas)

FEBRUARY 21, 1959.

The Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959 was the year's first tax bill and major legislation from the Ways and Means Committee in which I participated as a committee member. Because this bill affects many people (there are even more insurance policyholders than taxpayers), because insurance is a unique corporate type of business, and its taxation is extremely complicated and technical, I had a real tax baptism. Insurance is already the most heavily taxed thrift institution and the trend is well established away from savings in favor of protection only. At the least, I suggested in debate that the economic impact of State and Federal taxes plus this increase should be more carefully studied. While the bill attempted to improve existing law, and did in several ways, I opposed it finally because of the 90 percent increase in taxes over last year which may well result in increasing insurance premiums and in expanding social security, the Government's competitive provision for everyone's future. (My brief analysis of this insurance bill will be mailed to anyone requesting it.)

Labor leaders' joint pronouncements deserve everyone's attention. AFL–CIO's Reuther announced a march on Washington of the unemployed. AFL–CIO's Meany, in Puerto Rico, announced labor's decision to demand more pay and shorter hours. How's that for logic? You are out of work, so your labor leader demands higher pay and Government intervention. Of course, the whole trouble of these two pronouncements springs from the fallacious unconstitutional reasoning behind the 1946 Employment Act which implies that the Federal Government is responsible for employment.

In economic fact, this cannot be, regardless of the political and demagogic appeal. Nor do I think Reuther and Meany believe it either. They know, too, that elbow grease, initiative, and work provide employment, not another Government made-work contract which must first drain the tax money from the people. The fact that Government does not first get the money in before spending it does not change the simple economic logic that if you spend more than you take in, live beyond your income, you build inflation resulting in weakened currency and ultimate economic crash. The logic of Messrs. Reuther and Meany is consistent only with that of socialists, not with freedom and free enterprise. If, because of Government control and big spending economic freedom is lost, then necessarily all personal freedoms will go. This attempted economic security sought by Government handout is not security at all, but a cancellation of all our freedoms, even as the prisoner in jail has the security of food, clothing and housing but lacks real freedom—to direct his life minute by minute, day by day, as he sees fit.

Battle of the Budget Department (U.S. News & World Report, Feb. 13). "Democrats are pushing programs they know the President will reject. Bills are framed to offer huge sums of aid to large groups. The political strategy: Show that the Democrats want to help people, but that a Republican President won't let them." Political attempts of this kind to take credit and place blame by spending our taxpayers' money, along with the labor leaders' demands, is absolutely contrary to the economic philosophy of free enterprise, the American way. Perhaps we should remember the 10 cannots, a modern addition to the Ten Commandments.

"You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot help small men by tearing down big men. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. You cannot lift the wage earner by pulling down the wage-payer. You cannot help the poor man by destroying the rich. You cannot keep out of trouble by spending more than your income. You cannot further the brotherhood of man by inciting class hatred. You cannot establish security on borrowed money. You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves."

It was this philosophy of economic liberty which Abe Lincoln personified and which I endeavored to present in speeches over Lincoln's Birthday. Liberals, the big spenders charging our costs of government to the future, as I see it, are doing something absolutely immoral, charging our bills to our children and grandchildren. Taxpayers today can vote. Taxpayers as yet unborn cannot vote. Let's unburden our grandchildren. Further, let's not talk about cutting our debt and taxes without practicing what we preach, namely, by cutting down the wasteful Government spending programs and those in the welfare field.

George Washington's counsel in his "Farewell Address" has never been disproved: "As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinions should cooperate."

So, it's up to the voter—that's all there is to it. When will the people recognize, praise, and demand fiscal responsibility of the Congress? Now is the time.

Eulogy for the Late Bernard Austin

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, the late Assemblyman Bernard Austin represented the Fourth Assembly District of Brooklyn in the State legislature in Albany for many years. He died most unexpectedly on January 6, 1959, and his passing is a great loss to our community.

On February 26 the Williamsburg Post, No. 1004, of the American Legion, of which Bernard Austin was organizer and first commander, will hold a special memorial service for him. I have been invited by the post commander, Leo Price, and by Ira D. Brav, chairman of the memorial committee, to deliver a eulogy. I have prepared a few remarks expressing my feelings and thoughts regarding the deceased and wish to insert these remarks in the RECORD at this time:

EULOGY FOR BERNARD AUSTIN

I join with you on this sad occasion in paying tribute to the memory of a dear and departed friend with whom I was close for many years. His passing is a great personal loss to me. The 4th Assembly District, which he represented in Albany since 1935, is a part of my congressional district. I shall always remember the many times when we campaigned together and when we collaborated in helping constituents with their personal problems, as well as the community at large in its welfare, educational, civic and other problems.

It is now close to 2 months since Barney Austin has left our midst and has gone to the Great Beyond. For me, it is still difficult to believe that he is no longer with us. In the prime of his life he left his dear ones and his numerous friends who knew him so well and loved him so much. He left a great void in their hearts—one which will never be filled, one which will never be healed.

How weak and fruitless must be any word of mine to console his near ones and dear ones from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. Yet, I cannot refrain from bringing to them the consolation that may be found in the fact that Barney Austin was loved and highly respected by all who knew him.

It is sometimes said that while, on the one hand, the Black Angel destroys a mortal, on the other hand it presents him to us in boldest relief. The living man is too close to us, too much a part of us, to be viewed objectively. Death reveals him in his entirety. Thus we now can visualize in its fullness and grandeur the unique personality that we knew as Bernard Austin. How rich and how beautiful was the life and the soul of him whose achievements meant so much to so many of his generation.

And what is it that stands out most in this hour of bereavement? It is the inner man himself, his honesty, his sincerity, his unselfishness, his wise counsel, his friendship. There was no cause touching upon the welfare of the people of our community that did not find in him a stanch and devoted supporter. He was a man of keen intellect, a person of good judgment, one who was able to see through a problem to its end.

When we think of Barney Austin, we think of the words of the poet who said:

"Here was a man whose heart was good,
Who walked with men and understood.
His was a voice that spoke to cheer,
And fell like music to the ear.
His was a smile men loved to see,
His was a hand that asked no fee
For friendliness or kindness done.
And now that he has journyed on,
His is a fame that never ends,
And leaves behind uncounted friends."

Barney Austin was indeed a man of leadership, one of whom it can be truly said that his noble deeds have won for him a devoted following. These noble deeds will live forever in the hearts and in the minds of his many friends who came to pay their tribute to him today. He was a pillar of strength in our community for many years, and here among his friends his name will always occupy a foremost place of honor and love.

"And now he rests; his greatness and his sweetness
No more shall seem at strife;
And death has moulded into calm completeness
The status of his life."

May his memory be blessed and honored.

Isthmian Canal Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under a previous order of the House, our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] will address this body tomorrow on the most timely and gravely serious subject of the Panama Canal—its control and jurisdiction.

As Members of this body know, he has made extensive studies of Isthmian problems, especially the diplomatic and juridical, and starting on March 26, 1958, made one of the most comprehensive series of addresses on this subject in Isthmian history.

Ever since the 1956 Suez Canal crisis, world attention has become increasingly focused on the Panama Canal. Thus, it is of the highest importance that the Congress, which is the ultimate authority in the determination of Panama Canal policies, should be fully informed.

I am sure that his address will be highly informative, definitely constructive, and delivered in his usual brilliant form.

The Farm Folly of a $9 Billion Surplus

OF
HON. THOMAS H. KUCHEL
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, by July of 1959 the U.S. Government will have over $9 billion of surplus farm commodities in Government inventories and under loan. It will cost the Treasury of the Government of the United States $1 billion a year—that is $1,000 million a year, Mr. President—merely to provide storage for the accumulated farm surpluses.

On January 30, 1959, in San Francisco, the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, made a speech on farm problems generally and on the problems of the sugar beet industry in particular. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the address be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FARM FOLLY OF A $9 BILLION SURPLUS

I am pleased to participate in this meeting sponsored by the California Beet Growers Association. I count it an added privilege to find here also so many representatives from other sugar beet areas throughout the country. It is always a joy to visit this historic and beautiful city in the Nation's leading agricultural State.

The development of the beet sugar industry is one of the most fascinating chapters in the history of American agriculture. It is a story of vision, initiative, struggle, of repeated failures and final success. It is a story of the triumph of perseverance by free men in a free economy in a free land. Perhaps it will not be amiss for us to refresh our minds on a point or two of that story.

Early in the history of this Nation, men of vision watched with keen interest the development of the beet sugar industry in Europe. The United States was then almost completely dependent on foreign countries for sugar. These men saw that if we could produce beet sugar here in the United States, great advantages would result. A new industry would bring new life to the economy. A new and profitable crop would be added to our agriculture.

Back in the 1830's the first recorded attempts were made to establish a beet sugar industry in this country. The Beet Sugar Society of Philadelphia in 1836 obtained 600 pounds of beet seed from Europe. But the seed was planted too late and no sugar resulted. Then about 1839 a factory at Northampton, Mass., succeeded in producing some 1,300 pounds of beet sugar. After operating for about 2 years, this factory closed its doors.

In the next few decades no less than 13 beet sugar factories were established in widely separated localities from Maine to California. One after the other, they all failed.

One of these attempts that is most interesting to me concerns the efforts of the Mormon pioneers to establish a beet sugar industry in Utah. In these early days, more than a century ago, the people of Utah, including some of my progenitors, were buying sugar for $1 a pound—at a time when a dollar went a great deal further than it does today.

After a study of beet sugar operations in France, Mormon Church officials organized the Deseret Manufacturing Co., intending to establish the industry in Utah. The company bought a complete sugar manufacturing outfit and shipped it from France to New Orleans. It arrived in April 1852. They brought the plant up the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers to Fort Leavenworth. There they loaded it into covered wagons. In November 1852, after many difficulties and hardships, the equipment reached its destination.

I wish I could say that this tremendous effort immediately resulted in the birth of a new industry in Utah and in the Nation. Unfortunately, history records that the promoters lacked sufficient technical knowledge and the factory produced only inedible syrup. Not until over a quarter of a century later was the first beet sugar industry in the United States established on a truly successful basis.

That was in 1879 at Alvarado, Calif.

Without taking anything away from California, however, I am happy to say that the people in Utah also persisted and eventually developed a flourishing sugar-beet industry.

In the past 80 years, the sugar-beet industry has had a steady growth. Some 64 factories now produce over 2 million tons of refined sugar annually.

California, the home of the first successful sugar-beet factory, is now also the Nation's largest producer of sugar beets.

Last year, despite a poor planting season and sharply reduced yields, California produced about one-fourth of all the sugar beets grown in the United States.

The sugar-beet industry is in a solid position. Production last year was about 15.3 million tons. This was about 30 percent above the 10-year average and only slightly below the all-time high of 1957. Yields per acre in the past 2 years have been higher than ever before. But you are not burdened with surpluses as producers of some other crops are. The industry has been doing a good job of expanding production and markets simultaneously.

Your operations have been realistic—geared to market conditions.

The Sugar Act is realistic legislation. It has brought benefits to sugar-beet and sugarcane farmers, to consumers of sugar, to the sugar industry as a whole, and to our foreign suppliers.

But the sugar program cannot be used as a model for farm crops in general, particularly those produced in quantities beyond our domestic needs. We import much of the sugar we consume. Therefore surpluses of sugar, when they develop, tend to occur abroad rather than in this country. We have helped alleviate the problem of surplus abroad. The U.S. Government and the domestic sugar industry have participated in the development of an international sugar agreement designed to stabilize the world market. I know it is due in no small part to the cooperation of many of you that no major difficulties have been encountered in adjusting our domestic production so as to prevent the piling up of surpluses here at home.

By keeping prices at reasonable levels the danger of pricing sugar out of the market has been avoided.

The program has permitted and encouraged more efficient production. Here in California from 1924 to 1957 yields per acre rose 127 percent. In our country's beet area the acreage per farm has doubled since the prewar period. This has permitted the use of labor-saving machines which have simplified production and harvesting problems and have reduced costs. During the past decade the man-hours required to produce a ton of beets have declined by at least one-third.

But, I repeat, the sugar program cannot be used as a model for wheat, cotton, corn, rice, peanuts, and tobacco programs, except in this respect, the sugar program has been realistic.

The programs for the six legislatively designated basic crops have not been realistic. The sugar program has been adapted to the particular circumstances surrounding U.S. production of sugar. The same cannot be said of the past programs for the basic crops.

Unrealistic programs have priced the basics out of some of their oldtime markets. Competitors at home and abroad used the artificial price umbrella to expand their production and move in. Surpluses piled up at home, followed by more and more cutbacks in acreage.

Last year we harvested 16 percent more acres of sugar beets than the 10-year average from 1947 to 1956. But last year, compared with the average for the same 10 years, we harvested 10 percent fewer acres of corn, 16 percent fewer acres of wheat, 25 percent fewer acres of peanuts, 26 percent fewer acres of rice, 34 percent fewer acres of tobacco, and 46 percent fewer acres of cotton.

Now I know there will be some who will quickly point out that comparing an import crop with export crops is not very meaningful. I don't want to read too much into this comparison. All I want to do is to show that where we have realistic programs—programs adapted to market conditions—programs that make sense—we can have an expanding agriculture. Where we have programs that are outmoded, unrealistic, not adapted to market conditions, we have a contracting agriculture.

As you know, the Administration has recommended that the Sugar Act be extended. Senator ELLENDER has introduced a bill to make the Sugar Act permanent. This measure is cosponsored by many Senators from Western States, including Senators KUCHEL and ENGLE of this State. These proposals illustrate the importance of this legislation, not only to farmers but to all our people.

It seems paradoxical, but the sugar program's popularity may constitute its greatest weakness. When the pressures to increase production are as great as they are in the case of domestic sugar beets and mainland cane, they demand attention.

The Department of Agriculture is charged with administering the act in a manner that will protect the welfare of consumers as well as the welfare of those engaged in the domestic sugar-producing industry—and that includes the growers.

I trust that all branches of our domestic sugar industry will collaborate with the Department in dealing with the problems that appear to face us in administering the sugar program. The success of the past has been due in large part to the fact that the sugar industry has borne a major share of responsibility for the administration of this program. Let us continue to face facts honestly and courageously. I feel confident that if we join in support of fearless and essential administrative actions, the sugar program will continue to be an effective force, bringing benefits to producers, the domestic sugar industry, and consumers.

Your future progress, like that of all agriculture, depends on how successfully you lower costs, improve quality, and expand markets.

As one who grew up in sugar-beet country, who was thinning beets with a short-handled hoe at the age of 7, I'm delighted to see the advances that are being made.

With your great record of achievement, you can look ahead to still further progress—to improved varieties, better control of disease, and such developments as the monogerm seed to bring greater efficiency and more profits in the future. The productive new varieties you are now growing have done well in holding down our old enemy, curly top. You've learned a lot about using fertilizer to increase yields. The sugar beet has been tailored to fit the machine, and machines have been built to take over most of the tasks in the fields.

But new problems are always arising. The new varieties don't stand up to virus yellows. And we have not yet achieved a quality in machine harvest that is as good as the best when beets are harvested by hand.

The search for the right answers is being carried forward on many fronts. Some of the solutions will come out of production research; others will grow out of research on processing problems. Still other advances will come from the basic research of our new pioneering laboratories.

With all these efforts we are building for the future—for greater efficiency in production and marketing, which means lower costs, for higher quality, and for new markets at home and abroad.

This is the road to a truly prosperous, expanding, and free agriculture.

Immediately before us, however, is the task of completing a long overdue revision of the farm price support programs as applied to the basic crops.

The President yesterday sent a special agricultural message to Congress. This was his fourth agricultural message. Again he called for changes in a farm program that has become outmoded, costly, discriminatory, and harmful.

We still have only a small part of the program the Administration asked for and that farmers need. We have had to fight every inch of the way to get more flexibility into the pricing mechanism. On some commodities—tobacco for example—nothing has been done. On others we got a little flexibility but not enough. That is why it has been necessary to devise and maintain such emergency programs as the soil bank and Public Law 480.

Our program really has never been put into operation. It has never been given a real try.

That is why the surpluses have built up. That is why a few farm commodities still have serious problems.

Yet our technicians estimate that, even with the little legislation we have been able to get on price supports, we have expanded markets and cut costs to taxpayers by a billion dollars in 1958. And farmers are taxpayers, too.

My fellow citizens, the situation is critical.

The present price support, acreage control program as it applies to wheat is bankrupt. Tobacco and peanuts are also in trouble.

Wheat is our No. 1 problem. Harvested wheat acreage has been cut by over 20 million acres since 1949—yet, under artificial pricing, combined with good weather, we now have by far the greatest wheat surplus in all history.

By July 1960 the carryover of wheat will be about 1½ billion bushels—enough to supply our normal domestic requirements for 2½ years. We will have $3½ billion tied up in wheat alone. We cannot continue to produce wheat for government by government-provided incentives.

We have spread the Wheat Belt all over America. Wheat acreage has increased in areas of high cost, while acres have been cut back in areas where production is most efficient. This doesn't make sense.

The cost of farm price and income stabilization programs have risen dangerously high.

By next July we will have over $9 billion of surplus farm commodities in Government inventory and under loan. The cost of storage and interest on these Government stocks will be $1 billion a year. This is fantastic and indefensible.

The program is unfair and discriminatory.

Farmers produce commercially about 250 farm crops. Only a very few are price supported. And 85 percent of our Federal inventory of farm commodities consists of just three crops—wheat, cotton, and corn.

Less than one-third of our farms account for by far the greater part of our price support outlays.

About one-fourth of the cotton farms have three-fourths of the cotton acreage allotments.

Two-fifths of the farms with wheat allotments have 90 percent of the allotted acres.

Thus, relatively small numbers of farms—usually those with the highest income—account for practically all of the Government price support outlays.

Finally, the old program is harmful not only to producers of wheat, tobacco, and peanuts—but harmful to agriculture as a whole.

It has caused distortions throughout our agricultural economy.

It has caused many people to regard farm programs with suspicion and resentment.

It has depressed farm income.

It has wasted farm resources.

It has placed a ceiling on farm opportunity.

It has enmeshed farmers in a maze of Government controls.

The President again recommended to the Congress further forthright changes in our farm price supports. He urged that price supports no longer be related to a standard 45 years old, but to a percentage of the average market price during the previous 3 years.

If the Congress still prefers to relate price supports to outmoded standards, the President urged that discretion be provided for establishing the level in accordance with guidelines fixed by law. This is now the case for all commodities except the few for which supports are mandatory.

The alternatives before us are clear. Take wheat. Either we must clamp down with more rigorous controls on wheat producers than we have ever had before—more controls that Congress has ever been willing to impose—or we must move toward market expansion and greater freedom to produce and compete.

The controls we have don't control. Wheat allotments have been cut. But wheat yields have nearly doubled in about 20 years. And last year's crop was the biggest ever.

Moreover, the controls provided by earlier Congresses have been watered down by later Congresses. The allotments used to be based on planted acres—now they are based on harvested acres. The minimum national allotment for wheat is 55 million acres, required by law. But if we applied the formula in the old 1938 law, still in effect, to wheat in 1959—please note this—the national allotment would be zero acres—no wheat production at all.

A far better approach, I believe, would be to provide wheatgrowers with a program that moves toward freedom to produce and compete for markets.

When such a program became fully effective, it would eliminate all acreage allotment and marketing quotas for wheat.

It would relate price supports for wheat to realistic market conditions.

Preferred quality wheat would then sell in the markets at premiums above support.

With such a program, wheat could really compete on its own merits. Better land use would result. High-hazard land would go into pasture and hay.

Other conservation measures would be adopted by farmers.

Farmers could more effectively manage their farms and their crop rotations.

There would be an adjustment of acreage between such competing crops as corn, grain sorghums, and soybeans.

Changes are needed for tobacco and peanuts also. The present laws require price supports at continually rising levels. As prices of U.S. tobacco increase, foreign buyers change their blends and turn to other sources of supply. Legislation is needed to permit adjustments in support levels.

For peanuts, too, the law should be changed so that growers can expand their markets.

The Agricultural Act of 1958 was a step toward more realistic programs for producers of corn, cotton, and rice. Now we need prompt and effective action in behalf of producers of wheat, tobacco, and peanuts.

This is not only the wheat, tobacco, and peanut producers' battle for realistic farm programs. This is your battle—the battle of everyone in every phase of agriculture.

Our present costly farm programs contribute to unbalancing the budget. That is of utmost concern to every citizen. No nation can go on indefinitely living beyond its income.

The President last week submitted a balanced budget for the coming fiscal year—a budget that "will help prevent further increases in the cost of living and the hidden and unfair tax that inflation imposes on personal savings and incomes."

As the President said in his Economic Report: "Our objective must be to establish a firm foundation for extending economic growth with stable prices into the months and years ahead. This will not come about automatically * * *. An indispensable condition for achieving vigorous and continuing economic growth is firm confidence that the value of the dollar will be reasonably stable in the years ahead."

This is of vital importance to all of us. During periods of economic expansion, the demand for sugar increases. Your prosperity, like that of our agriculture in general, depends on the soundness of the American economy.

We must keep our economy strong. Yes; we must keep America strong—strong economically, strong socially, but, above all, spiritually strong—so that our way of life may endure. This is your challenge and mine—a challenge to every American, no matter who or what he may be. "God grants liberty only to those who love it and are ready to guard and defend it." (Daniel Webster.)

Analysis of H.R. 3000 and H.R. 3001

OF

HON. HOWARD H. BAKER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, on January 21, 1959, my distinguished friend and fellow member of the Committee on Ways and Means, A. S. HERLONG, JR., and I introduced H.R. 3000 and H.R. 3001 which provide for a basic reform of Federal tax rates and methods in five major tax areas. At the time these bills were offered to the Congress for consideration we stated:

The present Federal tax structure stunts economic growth since it both prohibits adequate capital accumulation and destroys capital once accumulated. We can no longer afford a Federal fiscal policy based only on short-term considerations, from fighting inflation in one year to fighting recession in another, while neglecting the root source of fiscal crises.

By removing tax blocks to progress, our bills would contribute more than any other possible Government action to our economic well-being and national security. In enabling the economy to grow much more rapidly and consistently than in recent years, these bills would counter the challenge of Russian communism for world economic leadership; encourage other nations outside the Communist orbit to reorganize their tax systems to permit more rapid economic development out of their own capital; increase the supply and mobility of venture capital, thus insuring a rebirth of the American genius for the starting and development of businesses; provide new and better job opportunities; insure adequate revenues for military preparedness and all other necessary Federal expenditures; smother inflation with growth.

These bills advocate the principle of tax reduction whereby there would be scheduled annual cuts of individual taxes and corporate taxes over a period of 5 years. After the first reduction, further scheduled reductions would go into effect if budget expenditures were not in excess of $77 billion or, regardless, if the reductions would not result in budget unbalance. In addition, the bills would establish by statute more realistic depreciation service lives; defer the capital-gains tax on sales of long-term capital assets which are reinvested within the taxable year; and reduce the rates of tax on estates and gifts.

Because of the widespread interest that has already been manifested in this meritorious legislative proposal, my able cosponsor, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HERLONG] and I have prepared a section by section analysis description of the purposes and provisions of our bills.

Sections 1 and 2 of the bills amend the Internal Revenue Code by adding new tax tables relating to annual reductions from January 1, 1959 through 1963 for individual taxpayers, including the rates applicable to heads of households. Section 3 of the proposals covers the new rate tables for the optional income tax where the taxpayer has adjusted gross income of less than $5,000.

Thus, beginning with January 1, 1959, there would be five annual coordinated reductions in all the graduated individual tax rates with the first bracket ultimately being reduced from the present 20 to 15 percent. The top graduated rate would be reduced from the present 91 to 47 percent over the 5 years, subject only to the postponement feature of the legislation covered in section 5 below.

Section 4 of the bills amends code section 11 relating to the tax imposed on corporate taxpayers. The present law provides for a corporate normal tax of 30 percent on taxable income and a 22-percent surtax on taxable income in excess of $25,000. The legislation provides five annual rate reductions spread between the normal and surtax. The first 3 reductions would reduce the normal tax 1 percentage point each year reducing this rate from 30 to 27 percent. The last 2 corporate tax reductions would reduce the surtax from 22 to 20 percent. Thus, at the end of the reduction period the corporate rate would be 47 percent, the same as the top individual graduated tax rate. The following summary will illustrate the scheduled corporate reductions:

Normal	29
Surtax	22
Combined	51
Jan. 1, 1960:
Normal	28
Surtax	22
Combined	50
Jan. 1, 1961:
Normal	27
Surtax	22
Combined	49
Jan. 1, 1962:
Normal	27
Surtax	21
Combined	48
Jan. 1, 1963:
Normal	27
Surtax	20

Section 5 of H.R. 3000 and H.R. 3001 would add a new section 22 to the code setting forth the criteria to be considered in postponing any scheduled tax cut. At the time of introduction of the bills, we explained the mechanics of postponement as follows:

Taking the President's 1960 budget estimate as the benchmark, the legislation provides that income tax rate reductions may be postponed after those to be effectuated as of January 1, 1959. Postponement would be made in the event of determination as of November 15 in any year that spending for the fiscal year is running in excess of $77 billion, and a state of budget unbalance is threatened.

While the postponement procedures may be applied separately as between corporate and individual tax rate reductions, every postponement of an individual tax rate cut must be accompanied by a postponement of a corporate tax cut. The only limitation on this linkage is where the result would be to postpone a corporate reduction for more than 1 year.

The bills further provide that each scheduled reduction in either the individual or corporate tax may be postponed for only 1 year with the schedule of subsequent reductions also being moved ahead 1 year. Thus, if spending should not be kept under control, it would be possible to space out the income tax cuts over a maximum period of 9 years without new enabling legislation.

The legislation places the responsibility for initiating postponement in the hands of the President. Balance has been struck as between the Congress and the Executive in the final exercise of postponement authority.

This balance arises in that adequate opportunity is afforded the Congress, and its tax writing committees, to review the Federal revenue requirements as related to the proposed budget. The bills provide that Congress may take several alternative actions. When the President has postponed a scheduled individual rate reduction from January 1 to July 1, the Congress may, by means of a joint resolution approved before May 15, act to make the reduction become effective as of July 1. In the alternative, a scheduled reduction may be further postponed by the Congress until the next January 1. The same alternative disposition may be made with respect to corporate income taxes. Thus, the Congress may make effective on July 1 a previously postponed corporate reduction or postpone it further until January 1.

Provision is then made under the bills that where the Congress has not so acted by joint resolution the President, by May 15, may further postpone until the next January 1 any corporate or individual cut previously postponed. The criterion for such postponements under the presidential authority "shall be used so as to permit the maximum possible reduction to take effect on July 1 next in the taxes imposed by sections 1, 3, 11, and 3402 without causing an imbalance in the budget of the Federal Government for the following fiscal year."

Subsection 5(d) of the bills provides that a total postponement of any date upon which a scheduled rate reduction shall take effect cannot be for more than 1 year. Subsection 5(e) is a deferral provision wherein if a scheduled reduction is postponed under any of the alternative procedures outlined above, subsequent rate reduction dates not affected by the current postponement "shall be deferred for 1 year." It is by virtue of this postponement authority and the deferral provision of the bills that the rate reductions scheduled for 5 years may be deferred for a maximum of 9 years without revising the statute. Subsection 5(f) of the bills proposes definitions of the terms of reference "imbalance in the budget," "rate reduction date," "current fiscal year" and "following fiscal year."

Section 6 of the bills would amend code section 167 by adding new provisions relating to the tax treatment of depreciable property. The intent of these provisions is that their use be at the election of the taxpayer. This new approach would add six broad statutory classifications of property subject to depreciation and also set forth the maximum useful life to be applied to such classes, as follows:

Classification	Maximum useful life, years
Buildings	30
Standard and general-purpose machinery and equipment, including buildings useful only to house such machinery and equipment	12
Furniture and related equipment	10
Special-purpose machinery and equipment, including buildings useful only to house such machinery and equipment	6
Miscellaneous small equipment chargeable to capital account, including office machines	4
Automotive equipment	3

There are several limitations set forth in applying these provisions. The statutory reduction would be applicable only as to property with a useful life of 3 years or more and involves new acquisitions of business plant and equipment. The advantages of this reduction in useful life is phased out over a 5-year period so that on property acquired in the first year affected taxpayers may take only one-fifth of the amount of reduction. As to property acquired in the second and each succeeding years, an additional one-fifth of such amount may be taken each year during each of the succeeding 4 years as to property acquired in each of such later years, with this limitation terminating entirely after December 31, 1963.

For example, assume a taxpayer acquired standard and general purpose machinery, which, under present law, would have a useful life of 16 years. Under the bill, the property would then fall into the standard and general purpose machinery category and for that property acquired in 1959, would have a useful life of 15⅕ years: 16—12=4÷5=⅘; 16—⅘=15⅕. Property in the same classification acquired in 1960 would have a useful life of 14⅖ and so on for property acquired in succeeding years until 1964, at which time the property acquired would have a useful life in this category of 12 years.

The bills also provide that except for taxpayers whose accounting is prescribed by a Federal or State regulatory body, the reductions in useful life of depreciable property "shall be applicable only to taxpayers whose books and records are kept in accordance with the determination of useful life there set forth."

As previously stated, we believe:

In practical effect, the new lives available for use in regard to property acquisitions in the fifth and succeeding years would permit an average increase of one-third in the rates of depreciation allowances. These increases would come on top of the liberal allowances in early years under the sum-of-the-year's digits and double declining balance methods, made available to taxpayers through the 1954 revenue code, and the extra first-year allowance granted to small business taxpayers in the legislation of 1958.

Section 6(b) of the legislation amends code section 1231, relating to capital gains and losses on property used in the trade or business, by providing that property subject to the special rule for depreciation shall not be entitled to capital gains treatment "except to that portion of the consideration received on the sale or exchange which exceeds the original cost or other basis of said property in the hands of the taxpayer." Thus, there is a limitation on the extent to which the long-term capital gains privilege may be applied to the adjusted basis of depreciable property.

Section 7 of the bills would add a new code section 1037 providing for the nonrecognition of gain on certain sales or exchanges of capital assets.

Our intention in offering this amendment is as follows:

In accordance with the precedent already established on the sale and repurchase of homes, our bills make statutory provision for tax-free transfer of capital by individuals, but not by corporations, from one investment to another when the transactions are completed within the taxable year, and the investments sold have been held by the taxpayer for at least 6 months. The result would be a deferral of tax on long-term gains until such time as the taxpayer disinvests. We have included this application of the rollover principle in the legislation since the only possible justification for taxing at any time the proceeds from sale of a long-term investment is that the seller is disinvesting with the intention of using capital gains as income for consumption purposes.

This deferral of tax on long-term gains is accomplished by providing that if capital assets are sold by an individual and within the same taxable year other such assets are purchased, any gain shall not be recognized to the extent that the aggregate purchase prices of such assets exceed the adjusted basis of capital assets sold during the year. Capital assets include those as defined in code section 1221 or property used in the trade or business as defined in code section 1231(b)(1). Where the purchase of capital assets results in such nonrecognition of gain there must be an adjustment to the basis of each of the capital assets purchased and held at the end of the taxable year. These adjustments to basis "shall include a reduction by an amount equal to the total amount of gain not so recognized allocated to each capital asset so purchased * * * in the proportion that the purchase price bears to the aggregate of the purchase prices of all such assets" purchased and held at the end of such taxable year.

For example, assume a taxpayer electing to apply this provision at the end of his taxable year to asset A costing $2,000, asset B costing $3,000, and asset C costing $5,000 purchased during such year. For the same taxable year under the bills, assume a gain from sales of other capital assets in the amount of $4,000 was elected not to be recognized. This nonrecognized gain would be allocated to the assets held in proportion to their purchase price so that asset A would have its $2,000 basis reduced by $800, asset B would have its basis reduced by $1,200, and asset C would have its basis reduced by $2,000. Therefore, the basis of the assets for the purposes of measuring gains on such assets on future transactions would be as follows: Asset A, $1,200; asset B, $1,800; asset C, $3,000.

In other words, as to assets purchased during any year any tax-free gain must be proportionately allocated to each such asset. The formula for allocation is the ratio of the purchase price of any one asset in relation to the total of purchase prices of similarly acquired assets during the same tax year. The right to invoke this nonrecognition or "rollover" of capital gain may be made at the election of the taxpayer.

Section 8 of the bills would reduce the top rate of estate tax and proportionately reduce the lowest and intervening rates. Section 9 would reduce the gift tax rates. Upon introduction we outlined these reductions as follows:

Instead of establishing a new formula for setting tax rates on estates and gifts, our bills would simply bring the top rate of estate tax down to 47 percent to coincide with the top rates of individual and corporate tax after 5 years, and consistent with the present relationship, reduce the top rate of gift tax to three-fourths of this figure, or 35.25 percent. All lower rates would be reduced in proportion. Thus, the estate tax rates would range by taxable brackets from 1.75 to 47 percent, compared with the present 3 to 77 percent, and the gift tax rates from 1.25 to 35.25 percent, compared with the present 2.25 to 57.75 percent.

Section 10 of the bills amends the withholding provisions of the code—section 3402—so as to conform the withholding tables and rates with the forward scheduled individual income tax reductions provided under the bills. Section 11 would amend the code provisions relating to declaration of estimated tax by individuals—section 6015—and corporations—section 6016—to make it clear that such declarations could be filed "on the basis of the tax rates in effect on the last day prescribed for the timely filing of the declaration of estimated tax."

Mr. Speaker, in closing we hope that this analysis will be helpful in furthering the objectives of our bills and understanding of the methods by which we seek to attain these objectives. Federal fiscal policy needs a new look—a long-range look that will provide greater economic growth, greater stability to Government revenues, and greater incentives to taxpayers. We believe our bills would contribute more than any other possible Government action to our economic well-being and national security.

Public Policy, Rural Electrification, and the Farm Telephone

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE S. McGOVERN
Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most remarkable achievements of the past quarter of a century is the extension of electricity and telephone service to the farms of America. No one can fully measure the benefits that have come to rural families in the form of electric lights, washing machines, refrigeration, telephones, and power equipment, all of which have lightened the labors and enriched the lives of farm families.

Both rural electrification and rural telephone service have been made possible largely through low-cost Federal loans to farmers' cooperatives. It is gratifying to know that this grassroots experiment in rural democracy has actually returned a profit to the Government as cooperatives have honored their loans and paid them back ahead of schedule. Furthermore, the program has brought countless millions of dollars to the mainstreets of America, as farmers have purchased electrical equipment and appliances of all kinds.

Recently, I have been alarmed by Federal practices and proposals that jeopardize the continued growth and reasonable operation of the REA program. The proposal in the President's current budget message that REA interest rates be increased would, if actually applied, stifle rural electrification and telephone service.

The REA's for more than two decades have paid back their loans at the present 2-percent rate to the mutual benefit of both themselves and the American public.

Even if one recognizes that the administration has deliberately raised its own costs of borrowing money above the 2-percent level, it would be a wise public investment for the REA program to be conducted as in the past. Vast Federal outlays were made to build the Nation's railway system and other needed services. Why not a small investment in the blessings of rural electricity? Or better still, why not a rollback of interest rates so that the Government can once again borrow its needed funds at a reasonable level?

In a recent column, Sylvia Porter, the financial analyst, points out that during World War II, military spending sent our national debt to $280 billion. The interest charge on that debt was $4.7 billion. "Today, the debt is about the same, $283 billion," writes Miss Porter. "Yet, the interest payment is much higher, up to $8 billion. This has been no accidental swelling in interest payments," she writes. "Instead, it has been the result of deliberate policies adopted at the higher policymaking levels in Washington."

I feel sure that many of my colleagues believe as I do that we must fight any disruption of the REA program that would certainly be caused by jumping interest rates on the rural electric association loans.

Recently, I received from Mr. Lawrence Stoley, Highmore, S. Dak., the secretary of the South Dakota Rural Telephone Association, a copy of the resolutions passed by that distinguished association at its annual meeting. I have also been honored recently with an invitation to address the annual meeting of the National Telephone Cooperative Association in Washington.

Believing that they will be of interest to my colleagues, I include a copy of the South Dakota resolutions, together with the text of my remarks to the national association:

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN GEORGE S. MCGOVERN TO THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION, STATLER HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D.C., FEBRUARY 7, 1959

I feel honored to appear before the National Telephone Cooperative Association. Since I have lived most of my life in the agricultural heartland of America, your work has long been of keen interest to me.

I have enjoyed my associations with your colleagues in South Dakota and the able staff representing your interests here in Washington. You have made progress in spite of heavy odds. I admire your spirit and determination. You have my support and that of many of my colleagues as you continue your efforts to build a healthy and prosperous rural America.

Never before has American agriculture been faced with so clear a worldwide challenge. We are the possessors of a mighty weapon—agricultural abundance in a hungry world. I use the word "weapon" in referring to the only kind of war the American people want to fight, the war against poverty and hunger and disease. That is why I have sponsored in the Congress a "Food for Peace Resolution," which calls upon our Government to use our farm surplus as a tool for freedom and peace.

More than ever before, our Nation needs men of vision and courage of the type exemplified by the people comprising your organization. As we meet here today, our Nation is caught up in a titanic struggle for military and scientific supremacy. All the world and the space beyond has suddenly been turned into an enormous laboratory, with the launching of globe-circling satellites a commonplace occurrence.

As we concentrate more and more on scientific achievement, I believe a word of caution is in order. Just as we have learned that man cannot live by bread alone, so we should not forget that a nation cannot live by science alone. Our concentration on the secrets of outer space must not replace our concern over the welfare of our fellow human beings. Our world needs more than ever the timeless message of the Good Samaritan.

Given that premise, I see no reason why a nation which has the brainpower to put a half dozen manmade satellites into orbit in outer space, send an atomic-powered submarine beneath the polar icecap, and break the speed of sound, cannot find a way to achieve for its rural people a standard of living equal to that of its city dwellers. Is it too much to ask that farmers receive an income comparable to urbanites and enjoy such blessings as the telephone?

Basically, I believe our farm problem is one of attitude—a misplacement of values. If, for instance, the present administration had as much concern for farmers as it does for the investment bankers, most of your problems would vanish. You would have two telephones in every farm home and an extra one in the barn.

Of course, farmers do not enjoy such favor. I do not want to be partisan today but it is a fact that when this administration took over the reigns of government, it set out to flex farm prices downward and interest rates upward. Since 1952 farmers have lost about $18 billion in income. On the other hand, the money lenders have increased their incomes many billions of dollars.

Last week the President's budget message denounced the farm price support program and called for virtual abandonment of the parity concept for farm prices. He gave as his reason the excessive cost of the farm program—not taking note of the fact that much of this cost stems from Secretary Benson's mismanagement and mistaken views.

Significantly enough, the interest on the national debt in this fiscal year will cost us $8 billion—highest in history and the second largest item on the President's budget. Only the defense outlay costs more. Yet the President said nothing about reducing the exorbitant interest rates we are paying the investment bankers holding Government notes. As a matter of fact he implied that higher interest rates were forthcoming. And you and I get socked more and more on all of the money we borrow. The budget message clearly calls for an increase in interest rates on REA loans—an increase which would throttle rural electrification and rural telephone expansion.

I do want to discuss the rural telephone program now and offer some suggestions. But I felt it important to quickly sketch in a few broad background strokes.

The drive to bring modern communications to rural America began a half century ago. It progressed nicely through the years just following World War I when 38 percent of all farm homes were equipped with telephones.

Then came the 1920's, a steadily deteriorating farm economy, followed by the depression years. The rural telephone program languished for more than 2 decades. In 1945, there were actually fewer telephones on farms than there were in 1920. It was then that farmers, having climbed out the economic basement, began a concerted drive once again for an effective rural telephone program.

With the support of farmers the Nation over, and the help of friends in Congress, you and others like you pushed through a new Telephone Act in 1949. On October 28 of that year President Truman signed it into law.

It was a program of great promise and farmers' hopes were high. But, if I interpret correctly letters I have received from my constituents and official Government reports, the vast potentiality of the act has not been realized.

The information that has come to me leads me to conclude that the rural telephone program is in need of a booster charge.

A decade has gone by since the program was passed. Yet the percentage of farm homes with telephones has only increased from 38 percent to 56 percent.

Henry Ward Beecher once said: "Laws and institutions are constantly tending to gravitate. Like clocks, they must be occasionally cleaned and wound up, and set to true time."

Clearly, the rural telephone program has gravitated away from its original purpose. And just as clearly, it needs to be brought up to date in light of mid-20th century living conditions.

Actually, there doesn't seem to be any single roadblock holding the program back, but a combination of many.

For one thing, telephone co-ops have been plagued by restrictive rulings. Take, for instance, the equity fund requirement for cooperatives. This has been a tremendous hurdle. I know it has been modified somewhat because I was working with your representatives including Dick Dell at the time it was changed. We had been putting pressure on the people administering the program for a long time. But we all know the problem has not been eliminated. Further special considerations for cooperatives are necessary.

The fact that you must borrow your money from the Federal Government complicates matters, when you have an unfriendly administration in power. It is no secret that this administration is cool, if not hostile, toward your program.

Look at the President's budgetary recommendations for next year. Like those of the other years, his request for the rural telephone programs is too small to do the job. Fortunately, Congress has refused to go along with the President's telephone budget in the past and I feel confident that we will increase it this year.

It is bad enough to struggle with insufficient funds, but now the White House wants to increase interest rates on the money you borrow. I promise you that I, for one, will fight this move with all my strength. You need higher interest rates on your loans like a drowning man needs a millstone around his neck. You know it, and I know it.

Furthermore, the administration knows it. Just last year REA Administrator Hamil said in a statement before a Senate committee:

"I have loan applications that have come to me in REA, particularly in the telephone program where an increased interest rate would be difficult to handle. As a matter of fact, Senator, I have had applications in the telephone program that we have been unable to grant with a 2 percent interest rate."

It seems obvious that the administration is deliberately trying to freeze both the rural telephone and the rural electric programs.

Certainly it has given no indication that it intends to tailor its policies in accordance with the intentions of Congress, reiterated last spring by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. In its report, the committee said:

"The committee feels that the Rural Electrification Administration has a responsibility for assisting and promoting rural telephone cooperatives where necessary to secure telephone service to farmers."

The progress report on REA's telephone loans reveals, however, that this admonition has not been carried out. It shows that as of December 1957, REA had approved loans to 205 cooperative-type borrowers and 371 commercial company borrowers. As of December 1958, aggregate loans approved to cooperatives totaled 209, with loans approved to 429 commercial borrowers. Last year, REA approved loans to 62 new borrowers. Of these, 58 were commercial companies and only 4 were cooperatives. That's a 14 to 1 ratio. Furthermore, the official report shows little stomach for promoting telephone co- that 75 percent of the total money loaned went to commercial borrowers. It is quite evident again that the administration has operatives.

No one would quarrel with this record, if it represented the most effective means of getting service into the remote rural areas. But the truth is that it does not.

As of December 1958, telephone cooperatives were serving approximately 2.5 subscribers per mile of line. In contrast, the commercial companies were serving nearly twice as many—4.6 subscribers per mile of line. It is obvious which type borrowers is serving the sparsely populated areas. It is also clear which type borrower has the greatest expenditure to make in getting started. When a cooperative gets a loan from REA, it can retain on the average of 32 miles of line in its old system. The commercial companies on the average retain about 77 miles of line.

Thus two points become clear: Cooperatives are the most effective instrument for getting service into the thinly populated areas, and they have greater handicaps to overcome than do their commercial counterparts.

On the face of the record, it is evident that we have a program suffering from malnutrition. To write a proper recovery prescription, we should do what all good doctors do with an ailing patient. Diagnose the trouble and take steps to correct the ailment.

Knowing that the commercial telephone companies do not like the RTA program, you can expect no help from that quarter. The Rural Electrification Administration itself seems preoccupied with the maintenance of an alleged neutrality policy, which says: "Don't do anything to offend anyone." All this seems to place the responsibility for improvement squarely on your shoulders.

For my part, I offer to you whatever assistance that is within the power of my office. I want to discuss legislation with you which you feel necessary to your program, and I would be happy and willing to meet with your representatives anytime to work out feasible proposals. May I suggest some steps we ought to consider immediately.

As a starting point, I would like to suggest the possibility of doing something about getting town and country to join forces in the extension of rural lines. Perhaps the time has come when we should raise or eliminate altogether the 1,500-population limitation that is now in the act.

We need also to fully explore the problem of cooperatives that are prevented from adding rural subscribers to their membership roles because they are barred from making the central town or small city a part of the same system.

Experience in the rural electric program has taught us that there would have been no program if REA personnel had not gone out into the rural areas and actually organized many cooperatives themselves. Perhaps the same type of assistance and promotion is needed here.

It may be that we should provide legislation transferring the funds and responsibility for co-op promotion from REA to the Farmer Cooperative Service, a branch of the Department of Agriculture exclusively devoted to cooperative problems and their solution. The best co-op talent in the Department could be brought into full play in this way. Since all agencies are now fully assimilated into the Department as a result of the Secretary's reorganization, I do not believe this transfer of assignment would cause any administrative problem. On the contrary, I believe the change would expedite the program.

Finally, Congress should move now to end the 10 percent wartime imposed excise tax on telephone service both for rural and city users. This is a discriminatory tax that was added as a war emergency measure which should be repealed.

I have touched upon a few of the more important points demanding attention in the rural telephone program. Before this fine convention concludes, I am sure you will have discussed many more.

Sometime prior to the time you leave this convention city for your homes, I would suggest that you pay a visit to your Congressmen and Senators up on the Hill. Sit down with them. Inform them of your problems. I can assure you, you will find willing listeners. Many of them look to you for guidance and leadership in this technical field.

When you get back to your homes, talk up the rural telephone cause among your neighbors at every opportunity. Marshal your strength. It is imperative that you revitalize your program. If you chart your course of action properly, and stick to it, I have no doubt that the promise of the Rural Telephone Act of 1949 will be fulfilled, as your part in the building of a more abundant rural America.

ANNUAL MEETING, SOUTH DAKOTA RURAL TELEPHONE COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION, MARVIN HUGHITT HOTEL, HURON, S. DAK., DECEMBER 12, 1958

PROPOSED RESOLUTIONS

1. Increased interest rates

Whereas the President and the Administration appear determined to increase REA interest rates by two or three fold; and

Whereas it is also proposed to increase the cost of financing still further by adding administrative costs on to and in addition to the regular interest; and

Whereas the rural electrification and rural telephone programs have successfully operated over the past years at the normal 2 percent interest rate and have shown a profit to the United States Treasury; and

Whereas the present loans made to rural telephone cooperatives are made to serve rural areas with low density and low operating revenue; and

Whereas approximately 50 percent of the rural population does not have adequate telephone service; and

Whereas good telephone service to all areas of the United States is vital to the defense of our Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States vigorously oppose any increase in REA interest rates and that the present interest rate of 2 percent be maintained and preserved.

2. Federal telephone excise tax

Whereas the Federal telephone excise tax was initiated as a wartime measure, and justified in the name of the national defense; and

Whereas the Federal telephone excise tax is still in effect, and continues to work an undue hardship on the rural telephone cooperative program; and

Whereas an excise tax is not in keeping with the concept which prevails under our Federal tax laws in that it is a form of regressive taxation, not in keeping with the concept of ability to pay and burdens those least able to pay: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we here at the annual South Dakota Rural Telephone Cooperative Association meeting condemn this discriminatory tax and petition the Congress this session for its immediate repeal.

3. Encourage development of telephone cooperatives

Whereas the major portion of REA telephone loans are now being made to commercial companies, and

Whereas many areas now needing telephone service are undesirable to commercial companies, and

Whereas formation of cooperatives seems to be the only way in which such service may be made available to such areas: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That REA be requested to encourage organization of cooperatives to provide such service.

4. Participation in NRECA insurance program

Whereas the NRECA has made available its retirement and security program to telephone cooperatives, and

Whereas this provides a plan tailored to the needs of telephone cooperatives: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That all telephone cooperatives in the State be encouraged to participate in this group insurance plan.

5. REA service to telephone cooperatives

Whereas a number of telephone cooperatives find it difficult to set up an accounting system acceptable to REA: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That REA increase the number of field auditors to meet this need.

6. REA Administrator

Whereas the REA Act of 1935 provided for the strict nonpartisan administration of REA, by stipulating the appointment of an Administrator by the President of the United States, with confirmation by the Senate, for a 10-year term, to insure the nonpartisan, nonpolitical administration of REA; and

Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture, did in 1957, require that all loans to REA borrowers of $500,000 or more, and that all loans of any amount requested by new borrowers, be reviewed by the Secretary's office: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the South Dakota Rural Telephone Cooperative Association, in annual meeting assembled, apprise the Congress of the United States of its vigorous opposition to any and all impairment of the authority of the Administrator as granted by the REA Act of 1935; and be it further

Resolved, That this association urge the Congress of the United States, as soon as it convenes in 1959 to pass a bill which would clearly and completely restore to the Administrator of REA all authority and functions vested in him by the REA Act of 1935.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES O. PORTER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 23, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I delivered last Friday night, February 13, before some 300 Oregon Democrats gathered for a fund raising dinner in Salem, Oreg.:

EARTH MIGHT BE FAIR

On January 4, the Sunday just before the convening of the 86th Congress, I attended a church service in Washington, D.C., invoking the blessings of God on the work of this Congress. One of the hymns, "Turn Back O Man," was familiar but it took on a particular meaning for me in connection with the jobs we Democrats have to do in Salem and in Washington, D.C. You may remember the exhortation, "Turn back O man, forswear thy foolish ways."

Here is the second verse:

"Earth might be fair and all men glad and wise,
Age after age their tragic empires rise,
Built while they dream, and in that dreaming weep,
Would man but wake from out his haunted sleep,
Earth might be fair and all men glad and wise."

Earth might be fair. We have the resources, human and physical. This evening I will talk about some foolish ways we might well forswear and about four places on this earth: Latin America, Washington, D.C., Oregon, and China.

Yesterday morning I was in Venezuela as a guest of the President who was formally inaugurated today. A few weeks ago I went to Cuba and spoke with Fidel Castro. Next weekend I shall confer with him again and make a speech in Santiago near San Juan Hill where Americans and Cubans mingled their blood on the battlefields in their common cause against the Spanish oppressors.

THE POLICY WAS TO KOWTOW

In my first term in Congress I accepted invitations twice to Puerto Rico and once each in Costa Rico, Colombia, Venezuela, and Honduras. As you may remember, my interest in this area arose from my investigation into the disappearance of Gerry Murphy of Eugene. The Dominican official explanation of his death was officially rejected by the United States, but only after a period of reluctance during which I learned, to my surprise and dismay, that our usual policy was to kowtow to non-Communist dictators.

Certainly this is a foolish way we must forswear, and we are in the process of doing just that, if earth is to be fair. We cannot attempt to lead the free world and appear to be faithless to our own revolutionary origins and deepest traditions of freedom.

It is a surprise for me, and at times a little embarrassing, to see how famous I am in Latin America and how newspapers up here refer to me as a Latin American "expert" or "specialist." All I have done is reaffirm that we Norteamericanos remember our own Revolution against a tyrant. We like governments of and by the people based on law. We hate tyrants. Nothing very new or radical about that position, except that somehow our State Department had given the impression in Latin America that democracy was only for us and that we preferred to deal with "strong man" governments. This was wonderful for the Communists but not for us. The United States was identified with the tyrants and the Communists with the democratic elements opposed to tyrants.

A CHANGE FOR THE BETTER

It is gratifying to be able to say that our official policies are changing for the better in this respect, thanks to the Vice President's exciting trip, Milton Eisenhower's report, and perhaps some of the protests made by me, the New York Times, the AFL–CIO, and many others.

In all these matters I am conscious of my ignorance and I try to keep in touch with experts, including those in the State Department. Generally, my activities for democracy and against dictators have been warmly approved by career men in the Department of State. Recently I received an enthusiastic letter from the top man in our Embassy in Havana with respect to my visit in Cuba.

NOT FOR THE GOP ALONE

Yesterday was the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, a man I refuse to give to the Republicans, a man much respected and loved in Latin America. One hundred and one years ago Lincoln said: "Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in our bosoms. Our defense is in the preservation of the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands, everywhere."

Let us now leave Latin America and turn to Washington, D.C., that city of alcohol, protocol, and Geritol. We do have a feverish pace. Last week my very able right-hand man, Jack Billings of Eugene, collapsed to the floor by his desk and had to be carried out on a stretcher. The doctors finally decided he had had a coronary without damage. He spent 4 days in the hospital and is now back at his desk.

As in Salem we in Washington, D.C., face great and urgent legislative challenges. We Democrats with our majorities have the opportunity and the responsibility. In Washington Senator JOHNSON has outlined a fine legislative program, a positive program, which I will be discussing as I travel around the Fourth Congressional District in the next few days.

"JUST A POLITICIAN"

The other day my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia, PAUL BROWN, told me about the politician who found a farmer in the backyard milking a cow. The farmer's wife called from the house to ask who he was and the farmer answered, "Just a politician." "You come right in the house," she yelled back, "and bring that cow with you."

Politicians are, as the libel lawyers put it, objects of fair comment which, you may have noticed, often includes a lot of unfair comment. "If you can't stand the heat, stay out of the kitchen," Harry Truman advises.

Alben Barkley and several brother Senators were once on a junket in a Middle Western State. Their bus stopped at a crossroads store. Alben and another Senator got out to stretch their legs. Alben spotted a native leaning against the store and proceeded to impress on him what a superduper Congressman this man had working for him in Washington. As they got back on the bus, the other Senator asked Alben, "By the way, what is the name of the Congressman from this district?" "Darned if I know," shrugged Barkley, "just some guy like you and me, trying to get along."

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

We politicians are, after all, only human beings, human beings often under tremendous strains. Of course, this is true in other lines of work except that the results do not receive so much public attention.

Let us consider the case of our two Senators. We talk about this privately. I think it is time to say something publicly. DICK and WAYNE were not getting along as we would wish. WAYNE's reception of DICK yesterday in the Senate and DICK's remarks are most encouraging. Both these men drive themselves hard. They are conscientious, intelligent, and courageous. They are human beings.

In partisan politics there is a tendency to choose up sides, a sort of polarization along adversary lines. This hasn't happened but it could happen. The Knight-Knowland rift didn't help the Republicans in California, nor would a MORSE-NEUBERGER split be an advantage to us in 1960.

I know that a few of you here tonight and some who are not here have already decided you are for one Senator and, hence, against the other. I tell you this is wrong. You don't and you can't know enough of all the circumstances to make any such judgment.

NO SIDES TO CHOOSE

I tell you this is unnecessary. The differences between them have not kept them from working effectively together on almost every issue. Naturally some of the newspapers try to blow the matter up. Last year I saw them quietly conferring in the Senate at a time when, if you believed some of the newspapers in Oregon, they were practically at each other's throats. Of course the Republicans want to encourage them to fight each other. How foolish of any Democrat to help in any way.

The test to apply to our Senators is not how amicably they get along but rather what they accomplish for the peace, prosperity, and freedom of the Nation. By this test they rank high on any list of leading Senators. They deserve our support and our friendship and I believe they have both. We are proud of them and their deeds which have earned them outstanding national reputations for political courage and intelligence. We grieve when they do not get along. We hope and pray that, for their own peace of mind, their differences will end. We will do all we can to speed that day.

NOT SAINTS, NOT LOST SINNERS

A politician, like anyone else, makes mistakes. Excessive adulation and excessive vilification are heaped on him. Seldom is he seen as just a guy trying to get along, to do this important, complex, and trying job as best he can.

Earth will be fair indeed when more citizens will evaluate their public officials as human beings, not as irreproachable saints or as unredeemable sinners.

Turning now to Oregon where the earth is fair in so many ways, but where too many persons are unemployed and where our per capita income is distressingly low. Our State is 100 years old tomorrow and naturally we look forward as well as into the past.

Certainly this celebration should call for a political truce. I congratulate Bob Holmes and the Democrats for their nonpartisan spirit in this matter. I reproach the few Republicans who delayed the issuance of the invitations to Mrs. Franklin Roosevelt, the Trumans, and Mr. Hoover. The centennial has no room for petty politics. The next hundred years will give us ample time for both petty and grand politics.

WHAT IS ESSENTIAL?

I read the Governor's inaugural address with great interest. Much had merit, just like the messages the President sends to Congress. What we now look for is deeds to match words. The spirit, however, seemed to me to be defeatist as indicated by his slogan, "Is this essential or merely desirable"? To the extent it has any meaning it denotes conservatism, caution, fear, when what we need, if earth is to be fair, is courage and confidence in the future of our great State. Hope, not desperation, is what we need now.

Oregon should stride into its second century, erect and unafraid. Is it essential that our children be able to go to college or just desirable? Only 18 out of every 100 of Oregon's eligible young men and women enter a 4-year college now. Is it essential that we have a full-time parole board or just desirable? Is it essential that Oregon families eat three meals a day or merely desirable?

Governor Hatfield's historic slogan belongs in history. It cannot help him or you or me answer our problems of progress in the present and future. All it really shows is a Republican attitude of despair and defeat.

OUR PROBLEMS ARE CHALLENGES

Our present economic position is bad. The latest figures from the Department of Labor show that 10.4 percent of the insured Oregon workers are drawing unemployment benefits. This is the highest in the Nation. We were also atop this dubious pinnacle in January of 1957. Last year, in January 1958, we were one-tenth of a percent from the top with only Montana edging us out for this tragic booby prize.

We have areas of chronic unemployment. The Labor Department's list of major labor surplus areas includes Portland, Albany, Coos Bay, Eugene, Pendleton and Roseburg. Our per capita income figure for 1957 was $1,914, California's was $2,504, Washington's $2,128, and the national average was $2,027.

Between 1940 and 1953 the average Oregonian made 1.2 percent to 11.9 percent more money than the average American. Since then, that is since the coming of the Republican Eisenhower administration, Oregon's personal income has risen but not as fast as the national average, with the gap growing even wider. We Oregonians make our living mainly from our timber resources, then, much less, from agriculture and tourists. Each area is capable of tremendous expansion. Our potentialities give us no reason for despair. We can hope to provide our citizens with many desirable services. Our problems are challenges, not chains.

TRADE WITH MAINLAND CHINA

I want to conclude by recommending a change of national policy that could help Oregon become a prosperous State, in fact, a truly maritime State. Oregon fronts on the Pacific Ocean, a great highway for trade. We can only improve the benefits to cost ratios for harbors like Reedsport and many others if we open up trade with mainland China and vicinity. We now enforce a total embargo on our trade with China, a policy that began in 1950. The position of the administration remains as stated to me in a letter from the State Department April 17, 1957, "This country definitely intends to continue the embargo."

We who want this trade resumed only ask that we be permitted trade with China on the same basis we now trade with the Soviet Union. This of course means trade in only nonstrategic items.

China's trade is estimated at about $500 million per year.

In 1931 Oregon and Washington sent 314 million board-feet of lumber to China, whereas in 1956 these States only sent 299 million board-feet to all other nations. In terms of 1954 dollars the 1931 China trade in lumber alone would have meant $16,221,004 for operators, woodworkers and longshoremen in these two States. A similar situation exists for wheat and flour.

POTENTIAL IS STAGGERING

Ivan Bloch, a leading industrial consultant in Portland, says "potentials of this trade stagger the imagination." He predicts "a great possibility of numerous new jobs and industry in the Pacific Northwest if trade with China is reopened."

Restrictions on trade only serve to postpone, but cannot prevent, the development of the military power of Red China. Effects of embargoes are now evaded by purchase or barter from other countries of the items which we refuse to ship to Red China. To say that certain items cannot be shipped to Red China and then permit them to be shipped to Russia, from where they are forwarded to Red China, serves no purpose so far as hampering the Red China regime is concerned. What is accomplished is to strengthen the ties between the Communist countries. On the other hand, increased trade between the United States and Red China would be a means of weaning her away from the Soviet bloc.

Removal of barriers to trade with China would greatly benefit Japan, whose primary market has historically been the Asiatic mainland, mostly China. Resumption of trade with China would reduce the need for the export of many Japanese goods to the United States. Opening of the Chinese markets to Japan would remove from competition in the domestic markets of the United States many goods which are now a primary target for domestic protectionists.

TRADE FOR TRADE'S SAKE

Questions of trade and of diplomatic recognition of the Peiping regime can be considered separately. Trade should be considered on the basis of "trade for trade's sake" and trade questions not mixed with international politics. Efforts of "Yankee traders" were prime factors in the greatness achieved by the United States. That trade should not be unduly hampered now, trade itself being the greatest weapon in the hands of a diplomat and, if skillfully used, can be a great instrument of Government policy.

Some former "China traders" are of the opinion that United States machinery, trucks, automobiles, metals, specialized equipment of all kinds, petroleum, and certain agricultural products could now find a good market in China. The Peiping regime has indicated interest in the purchase of capital goods and petroleum. Trade is now conducted by the Peiping regime, which tends to bypass traders and warehouses to deal directly with governments, or, if that is impossible, directly with producers in the country from which they purchase goods.

Advocates of increased trade see a market for large quantities of capital goods continuing over many years. They are dissatisfied with restrictions which keep them out of the trade and permit Great Britain and other European country traders to lay the foundations for possible future trade. United States trade with mainland China would contribute to an improved standard of living for the Chinese people, creating a market for many of our consumer goods. Chinese people would be able to see how much better goods are produced in the United States.

A SOURCE OF IRRITATION

The United States must create friendships with other peoples. Increased trade with China would remove a source of irritation. The smoothing of trade relations would pave the way toward long-range adjustment of Asian problems. Hostility is determined by many factors other than economic strength; a strong industrialized Red China would not necessarily be an increased threat to the United States. Rather, Red China, through economic strength, will be in a position to assert independence of the Soviet Union and to oppose further Soviet penetration of the Chinese economy. Since trade with the West would not be a temporary, but a continuing benefit to China, it would be difficult to see why she would endanger that benefit by action which would threaten the United States, since China would have so much more to lose by any such action.

American policy should be based on considerations of the benefits to the West from trade in nonstrategic goods as well as consideration of that portion of trade which benefits the Communist world. Certain goods, when sold, are strategic to the selling nation's economy. Where trade yields a net advantage to the West, it should be allowed and should be used, if possible, as an instrument for extending Western influence inside the Communist borders.

The blockade is ineffective. The Red China regime has not been undermined, but only forced to rely almost exclusively on the Soviet Union. The time for a change in our policy is here.

Last year the Oregon Grange strongly endorsed this point of view.

Senator Knowland has been removed from politics. In January last year the California Democratic Council urged resumption of trade with China.

SENATOR MORSE ON DULLES POLICY

On July 4, 1957, Senator MORSE said, "One of the results of the shortsighted Dulles policy is to turn over to our allies the economic advantages of trade in nonstrategic goods. Pacific Coast States are suffering great losses as a result of the boycott."

Henry Ford II, in January of 1957, pleaded for realism with respect to trade with satellites. He asked: "Shouldn't we give the people of Red China some alternatives to their present ties with the Kremlin?"

Even President Eisenhower in June of 1957 said, "I am personally of the school that believes that trade, in the long run, cannot be stopped * * * I don't see as much advantage in maintaining the differential as some people do, although I have never advocated its complete elimination." The "differential" to which he refers is the additional embargoed list for China over the list for the Soviet Union. It is, of course, too much to hope that the President's views would be reflected in action.

THE TIME IS NOW

My chief legislative project in the 86th Congress is the removal of this embargo. Nothing could mean more to Oregon's economy. I am having the necessary legislation drafted. I am encouraging the organization of the many persons who believe strongly in the political and economic benefits of trade with China. We are, I am sure, more powerful than the miscalled China lobby and the committee of one million. I am talking with Pacific coast Congressmen like JACK SHELLEY, of San Francisco. I am gathering evidence from Government departments, shipping companies, and elsewhere. I hope that the Committee for Trade with China, now being formed, will soon send a delegation to Washington to confer with congressional proponents, with the Secretary of State and the President. If it is not possible to arrange immediately for a congressional sponsorship of a trade mission to China, then the Committee for Trade with China should sponsor such a mission. I would gladly be a member of such a mission and I know other Congressmen and other Oregonians who want to be included.

The time for Oregon to became a maritime State is now.

FOOLISH WAYS, FOOLISH WAYS

Oregon's unemployment must go down and her per capita income must go up. Foolish ways, such as no new construction starts for public works, tight money policies that depress the lumber market, trade policies that cut us off from natural markets—all these and more foolish ways must be forsworn if our earth will be fair and all men glad and wise.

It is up to us Democrats to provide the leadership. We will meet the challenge both in Salem and in Washington, D.C. We will go forward into another hundred years of achievement for the families who make Oregon their home. We Democrats believe that we can improve our society if we are determined and if we use the abilities God gave us—and if we are not afraid to make mistakes from time to time and start again.

We Democrats are fully in accord with the closing verse of "Turn Back O Man":

"Earth shall be fair, and all her people one,
Nor till that hour shall God's whole will be done.
Now, even now, once more from earth to sky
Peals forth in joy man's old undaunted cry,
'Earth shall be fair, and all her folks be one'."

Thank you very much.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Isaiah 61: 10: I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God.

O Thou gracious Spirit of the infinite and eternal God, we thank Thee for our moments of prayer in the midst of days that are strange and strenuous and at times so very dark and dismal.

We humbly confess that feelings of fear and frustration frequently invade and infiltrate the sanctuary of our souls, causing us to live negatively and hopelessly.

Grant that the assurance of the righteousness and justice of God may strengthen and sustain us as we encounter difficult domestic and foreign problems.

In Christ's name we offer our prayer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FEDERAL RECORDS COUNCIL

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of section 6, Public Law 754, 81st Congress, the Chair appoints as members of the Federal Records Council the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. STAGGERS and Mr. MERROW.

PERMISSION TO SIT DURING SESSION OF HOUSE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may have permission to sit during general debate in the House today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THE HOME OF THE BRAVE BUT NOT THE LAND OF THE FREE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Cass County, Mich., prior to and during Civil War days, was a way station on the underground railway from the South to Canada, under which many a slave traveled on his way to freedom.

As the War Between the States drew to a close, many a colored person made it his permanent home, and Cass County has long been known as a locality where the Negro demonstrated his ability to earn, save, acquire property, an education, and participate, on an equal footing, in social and political life.

But today, those full of theory but short on fundamentals have once more demonstrated that, while this may be the home of the brave, it is no longer the land of the free.

While we are spending billions of dollars sweated out of taxpayers to carry progress to other peoples all over the world, here at home a paternalistic Government, dominated by so-called liberals and progressives, is denying freeborn Americans the moral and constitutional right to use their own property as they desire, even though that use injures no one.

Stanley Yankus, a native American, with an absolutely clean record, bought and paid for a farm in Cass County, Mich. He has a wife and three children. He decided to produce eggs for market and to use the grain, including wheat, grown on the farm to feed his hens and pullets. He established a paying, growing business.

But, in 1938, those who insist on directing and ordering the lives of others, under Democratic leadership, passed the agricultural adjustment legislation under which those producing certain crops, including wheat, were guaranteed an established price for what they raised and sold but were restricted in the acreage they might plant.

Yankus never was permitted to vote on the plan, never participated in it. He continued to grow wheat on more than the 10 acres allocated by the local committee. He fed the wheat to his chickens, sold the eggs.

Stanley was advised of the provisions of the Agricultural Act. He decided that he wanted none of it—no part of either the benefits paid under it or the restrictions imposed by it.

He mistakenly believed that the freedom, for which the forefathers fought and many of them died, still existed. Unfortunately, he was mistaken.

Now get these facts: Yankus bought and paid for his own land. He never received a dollar's benefit payment from either State or National Government. He paid his taxes. He never was permitted to vote on the Government's program limiting production. He planted more acres to wheat than the number allocated to him by the Government. He harvested his wheat, never sold a bushel, fed it to his poultry.

Nevertheless, down on him came the Federal Government. It imposed penalties. This Government seized $1,701 of his bank account. He still owes around $2,643 in unpaid fines and penalties and interest accumulating thereon imposed by a U.S. district court.

Stanley and his family have finally decided that, while this may be the home of the brave, it certainly no longer is the land of the free. He is contemplating selling his farm. He has made application and has been granted permission to settle in Adelaide, Australia, where he hopes to enjoy the status of a free citizen, no longer possible in America where the bureaucrats, the highbrows, the theorists, and those who insist upon ordering the lives of others, are day-by-day restricting liberties so dearly won by those who established this Republic.

No matter in what business you may be, you may be next.

The right to own and use your own property no longer exists. Try to get a job in a unionized industry; you pay the union dues first.

Stanley Yankus has courage in abundance. He is short on liberty. If he leaves us, it will be our loss—not his.

GROUND-BREAKING CEREMONY AT THE EAST FRONT OF THE CAPITOL

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD at this point the proceedings of the ground-breaking ceremony at the east front of the Capitol today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

(The matter referred to follows:)

GROUND-BREAKING CEREMONY FOR THE EXTENSION OF THE EAST FRONT OF THE CAPITOL, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1959, 11 A.M.

The Architect of the Capitol, J. George Stewart, acted as master of ceremonies.

Mr. STEWART. To the honored Members of the Congress, our neighbors on Capitol Hill, the distinguished members of the Supreme Court, their assistants, officials of the Library of Congress, and ladies and gentlemen, a warm welcome.

In undertaking this historic ground-breaking ceremony, it is proper that we should invoke the blessing of the Divine Providence. I ask the Chaplain of the House of Representatives, the Reverend Bernard Braskamp, to offer an invocation.

The Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., Chaplain of the House of Representatives, offered the following prayer:

Psalms 127: 1: Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it.

O Thou, who wert the God of our fathers, we rejoice that Thou hast also revealed Thyself as the companion and counselor of all their succeeding generations.

We are now invoking the blessings of Thy presence and favor as we have assembled here for this ground-breaking service.

In turning to the prayer of the sacred Scriptures, we are reminded of that memorable day when Thou didst command the children of Israel to enlarge the place of their tent and to lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes.

May we have within our hearts the testimony that we have heard and are heeding Thy voice calling and bidding us to strengthen and extend the walls of our Capitol.

Grant that when the work has been completed we may have the benediction of Thy grace and our chosen representatives may be inspired and find it possible to render larger service for our beloved country and all mankind.

To Thy name we ascribe all the praise and glory. Amen.

Mr. STEWART. It is my high honor, and personal privilege, to present a member of the Commission for the Extension of the United States Capitol, the Honorable EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN, the minority leader, U.S. Senate.

Senator DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, I presume that any modification of a historic shrine and structure that has over the generations insinuated itself into the hearts and into the affections of the people brings a clash between sentiment and necessity. And, oddly enough, I think a case can be made for both sides. On the sentimental side, and I use the term most advisedly, I think of it in terms of reverence, devotion, and respect for those things that are a part of the great pageantry of this Republic which have become so deeply instilled into the hearts of the people. I believe that sentiment, when the time comes to made a modification of one of our shrines, is a polite and good and felicitous deterrent, so that we do not act too hastily and too fast.

But on the other side, there is the question of necessity. One look at the dome this morning as it overhangs a bearing wall is probably better evidence than all the words that might be uttered in the House and in the Senate as to what the situation requires. It must be brought into line with the original concept of this Capitol.

Thousands—yes, perhaps millions—of people have seen the replica in the basement of the Capitol, and many have often wondered, no doubt, why the Capitol itself was not brought into line with the original architectural concept. In addition, of course, the rather soft sandstone walls that were built, portions of which have fallen on occasion, developed a situation that might conceivably jeopardize life and safety.

And so today we officially commemorate this modification of a great shrine and do it with full respect for sentiment and for the necessities as the result of the effacing hand of time. I can think of no person in whom at once that feeling of reverence and sentiment is so blended with a respect for reality and necessity as the very distinguished public servant who, for 46 years, has found in the Capitol the place for his labors. From here he has rendered the most distinguished service. From here he has uttered, over more than two generations, his hopes and his aspirations. He has devoted himself to the business of this Republic.

And so I am really honored, and I am greatly privileged today to introduce an old friend under whose Speakership I served in the House of Representatives when I was a Member of that body. So it is my high and happy privilege to present an old friend, SAM RAYBURN, Speaker of the House of Representatives and Chairman of the Commission for the Extension of the Capitol. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, Senator DIRKSEN, I appreciate your kind words in presenting me to this distinguished audience. Along with Senator DIRKSEN I am one of those who has a great regard and respect for tradition. I like the old things if they are historic. I want them to be used as long as it is possible to use them.

We found here a part of a shrine. Not only is the Capitol of the United States a shrine but it is also a workshop. We did not remove this east front because we needed more room. It was removed principally because it was in a dangerous condition. That is what some of the best architects in the country said about it after they had inspected it. Of course, a great many people criticized our action who had never examined this building.

I might say also that in this building is housed the legislative branch of the Government, that part of the Government that is closest to the people because it comes directly from the people.

The legislative branch of the Government is the most important branch of the Government because there would be no laws to execute if the legislation were not passed by the Congress. There would be no laws to interpret if the Congress did not pass laws to be interpreted.

So here we need room, we need surroundings as pleasant as possible. We need this beautiful east front and we need to hide this overhanging dome here that was discovered by many, many people.

The east front of the Capitol, when this work is over, will look exactly as it did before, except it will not be built of a soft sandstone. It will be built of beautiful, light gray, almost white, Georgia marble. And it is my hope that nearing the completion of this beautiful structure we will be able to sandblast the Senate and the House wings, because many people do not know that they are of light Massachusetts marble. When this old "hill" has sitting upon it this magnificent, almost white structure, it will be the pride and joy of everybody.

So today I have come here to use the spade, and to turn the first piece of ground, hoping that in January 1961—and I have been promised that as much as anyone could be promised anything—the incoming President of the United States will walk through a hall just above us and will be inaugurated on the steps of the new east front of the Capitol.

Mr. Architect, I am ready to break the ground.

(The Speaker thereupon took the silver spade and broke the ground.)

BENEDICTION

Mr. STEWART. The Chaplain of the U.S. Senate, the Reverend Frederick Brown Harris, will now pronounce the benediction.

Dr. FREDERICK BROWN HARRIS. Our Father God, with the hallowed majesty of this shrine of each patriot's devotion casting its spell upon our spirits, as with eyes upon the future we reach out to enhance its glory, we think gratefully today of a lofty character whose hands laid its foundations in heroic yesterdays.

Into the days that beckon, which we pray may be symbolized by the splendor of the stately pillars soon to be fashioned, send us forth with patriotism pure and undefiled, in the spirit of George Washington, with valor and patience, through evil and good report, to the final coronation of freedom and truth as the light of Thy countenance is lifted upon us. Amen.

(Thereupon the ground-breaking ceremonies were concluded.)

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY CONTROL

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill H.R. 3464, entitled the "Juvenile Delinquency Control Projects Act."

Every year the problem of youthful lawbreakers grows more serious. Every year we are confronted by a barrage of articles in popular and scholarly magazines about what should be done to stop juvenile delinquency. Every year a large number of bills is introduced suggesting action by the Federal Government to help States and communities solve this appalling problem.

During the last Congress, the Subcommittee on Special Education of the Committee on Education and Labor, of which I have the honor to be chairman, held extended hearings on the general subject of juvenile delinquency.

Many of the Nation's outstanding leaders in the field of youth work testified before our committee. They strongly agreed that we need to know far more than we do at present about the causes of delinquency, the effectiveness of present methods of treatment and control, and development of new ways of handling juveniles who go against society.

EXPLANATION OF THE BILL

Mr. Speaker, my bill provides for this.

It provides $5 million a year for 5 years to pay part of the cost of projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices for the prevention, diminution, and treatment of juvenile delinquency.

Projects may be proposed by States or other public or nonprofit private organizations.

Such projects would be evaluated by a National Advisory Council on Juvenile Delinquency consisting of 12 recognized authorities in professional or technical fields related to juvenile delinquency and members of the general public.

The Advisory Committee will make recommendations on the projects to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

This bill provides for demonstration projects. We expect that projects approved under the bill will be of an action-research nature—that is, actual field trials of methods and techniques in controlling delinquency.

The bill requires complete reporting of results. The Secretary is directed to disseminate any significant findings on juvenile delinquency control as soon as they occur. He is also directed, at the end of the 5-year period, to make a complete evaluation of how knowledge about juvenile delinquency has been advanced by all the projects taken together. In the interim, the Secretary is to make annual reports of his actions on the recommendations of the National Advisory Council, and to submit to Congress recommendations about the administration of the act or further legislation he thinks desirable.

PROPOSED PROJECTS

Mr. Speaker, as an illustration of the results we might expect from this bill, let me recount a few examples of projects suggested by witnesses before our committee:

A former Commissioner of Social Security would like to prove what one or more good, well-trained probation officers can do with juvenile offenders.

The chief of a State child welfare bureau wants to demonstrate what could be done by working thoroughly through the schools, where early truancy and misbehavior often spell future trouble but where understaffed faculties can do little about it.

The director of a private welfare agency thinks they could learn how to perform their present services more efficiently.

A prominent psychiatrist favors a detailed study of one segment of a city to try to identify predelinquent children.

A former Chief of the U.S. Children's Bureau would like to see cities of different sizes experiment on different methods of how to train police for work with juveniles and different methods of organizing police bureaus.

A training school superintendent thinks the ingredients of the personality of adults who are able to influence youths to go straight could be identified.

A State youth control official wants to change one of his training schools to a therapeutic community with high grade social workers to try to work changes in attitudes among those committed.

A correctional official hopes to perfect techniques to identify the few truly dangerous psychotic personalities among the thousands of juveniles he screens for probation, because he is scared to death he may miss one.

EXPECTED RESULTS

Mr. Speaker, I think we can expect significant results from a bill such as this. We have learned the value of demonstrations and research in many fields of endeavor. Not only in scientific fields does it pay off. Our Nation has realized wonderful results from similar demonstration and research projects in the fields of public health, vocational rehabilitation, and education. What could be a more practical step at this time than to assemble and spread what knowledge we now have about juvenile delinquency control, and to launch a broad, coordinated plan of demonstration projects to uncover and test new ways of dealing with this problem.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this bill will go far in finding more effective ways to prevent and treat juvenile delinquency. I think this will begin a coordinated effort that will assure that all promising avenues of development are followed in the most efficient manner. Even more important, perhaps, I think that we can assure that what is known and discovered through projects begun under this bill will be made available to the States and communities, schools and churches, of this country. Only then can they deal with this difficult and growing problem in the soundest possible ways. Many of the ideas so readily advanced today about what should be done about delinquency may be sound. We will not know which are sound and under which conditions they will work until we go about testing these ideas in actual situations.

This bill is an example of the best kind of role for the Federal Government to play in solving our major social problems. The States and local units of government, the private voluntary organizations and individual families must ultimately do the job of eradicating juvenile delinquency. But we here at this level can help to provide them with the leadership, the coordination, and some of the knowledge and tools to do their job better.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will receive early, favorable consideration.

DEFENSE SPENDING

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Speaker, on February 19, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES] took exception to an editorial published the preceding day in the Washington Post and Times Herald. The article in question gave even wider circulation to the frequently mouthed assertion by champions of national bankruptcy that we will face annihilation unless we spend billions of dollars more on defense, whether or not the expenditure is necessary.

The gentleman ably pointed out that the editorial could accomplish little more than to create psychological fear and panic, but I believe he neglected to mention that the Post turned its back completely on historical fact.

Like the members of the political faction it supports most frequently, the Post, by indirect quotation, took statements by Secretary of Defense Neil McElroy and twisted them into what it called a virtual acknowledgment that this administration had made a deliberate decision to accept a second-best position in the missile race with Russia.

I shall not dwell too long on the contents of this editorial, but shall say it continues in the usual vein about governmental spending. It boldly implies that budgetary deficits somehow are preferable to fiscal soundness, and are necessary to our moral well-being and economic strength. It also quotes the distinguished chairman of the House Military Appropriations Subcommittee as doing a great service to the Nation in his fight to have other billions of dollars added to our already enormous defense expenditures.

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that Secretary McElroy, in testifying before the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee last month, said that instead of lapsing into a secondary position in its missile race with Russia, the United States would maintain an overall superiority in striking power with a diversified arsenal of intercontinental and shorter range missiles, and during the next 2 years or so, heavy bombers. Secretary McElroy did state that we have no intention of matching the Russians missile for missile in an arms race, but emphasized that we would be considerably stronger in carrying out the diversified program.

I have always had the greatest respect for the gentleman from Texas and his opinion on defense matters, but I should state for the edification of the Washington Post and the Members of this body who recommend additional spending on long-range missiles that such views somehow did not always come from the same source.

Apparently, what caused the change of view among those who today advocate such exorbitant defense spending was the orbiting of the first Russian sputnik.

Shortly before that event, this body considered several amendments to the 1958 military budget.

At this time, I shall quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 103, part 6, page 8091. On this page of the RECORD on that date, we find the following:

> Mr. Chairman, my good friend the able gentleman from Pennsylvania has said that this is a contest between those who advocate weaker defense and those who advocate stronger defense. Well, there are some elected representatives of the people who think you get stronger defense if you get more efficiency and better management, fewer unnecessary military and civilian personnel. A stronger defense program is not necessarily the most expensive defense program. We cannot buy friends abroad with wasted dollars nor can we buy security at home with wasted billions.

The next statement comes from the RECORD of the same date on page 8092. It states:

> I think the adoption of the bill may mean in the long run that we will get better defense for fewer dollars. I know that there will eventually come a bitter revulsion against defense spending if we do not do our duty and try to keep it within bounds. Greater and greater appropriations tend to accelerate the inflation spiral.

A little later, on the same page, this statement appears:

> A gesture toward a demand for more efficiency and economy is in the best interest of national defense and in the best overall interest of the taxpayers generally.

Mr. Speaker, I cite these statements because they were made by the same gentleman who today is calling for the unnecessary expenditure of additional billions of dollars. What the gentleman said in 1957 was, in effect, what our Secretary of Defense told the Senate subcommittee last month. Briefly, Secretary McElroy said our diversified arms program will give us a stronger defense than a heavy concentration on one particular weapon. He stated that the additional expenditure called for would not accomplish what its sponsors said it would.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should point out that the gentleman from Texas voted in 1957 for deep budgetary cuts in our research and development program.

Today, he, the Washington Post, and many other advocates of deficit financing are calling for just the opposite.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that before the champions of uneconomic economy continue their cry for reckless spending of the taxpayers' money on just about everything, they examine their own position that day in May 2 years ago, shortly before the launching of Sputnik I, created such hysteria in some quarters.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES—EXPENSES OF STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 106) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 7, 1959, the expenses of the studies and investigations to be conducted pursuant to H. Res. 105 by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $75,000, including expenditures for the employment of investigators, attorneys, and experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, and all expenses necessary for travel and subsistence incurred by members and employees while engaged in the activities of the committee or any subcommittee thereof, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized and signed by the chairman of such committee and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The chairman, with the consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, is authorized and empowered to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any other departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The official committee reporters may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

With the following committee amendment:

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. It is not proposed to bring up today this so-called administrative assistance bill; is it?

Mr. FRIEDEL. The gentleman is correct. We have seven noncontroversial bills today that passed our committee by unanimous consent.

Mr. GROSS. What is the status of that bill, if I may ask the gentleman? Personally, I hope it will be killed, and promptly.

Mr. FRIEDEL. It was approved by the subcommittee, approved by the full committee, and we are now asking for a rule.

Mr. GROSS. It is presently before the Rules Committee?

Mr. FRIEDEL. It is.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the chairman of the subcommittee inform the House that the resolutions he is now calling up have been unanimously approved by the committee, and also that they are for the 2-year period of the 86th Congress unless otherwise indicated?

Mr. FRIEDEL. The gentleman is correct. These bills were approved by both the subcommittee and the full committee by unanimous votes. One or two of these bills are for a 1-year period only, but most of them are for a 2-year period.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—EXPENSES OF CONDUCTING STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 114) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 4, 1959, the expenses of conducting the studies and investigations, authorized by H. Res. 113, Eighty-sixth Congress, incurred by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $150,000, including expenditures for the employment of such experts, clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman of the committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

With the following committee amendment:

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Do I understand this is about twice as much as was appropriated last year?

Mr. FRIEDEL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GROSS. Can the gentleman tell me anything about the amount of counterpart funds in foreign countries? Have these funds been spent, or what is the situation?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I will yield to my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS] to answer that question.

Mr. HAYS. I would like to say to the gentleman that last year the Foreign Affairs Committee had $75,000 appropriated to it, of which it turned back to the Treasury $48,000. It spent counterpart funds in the neighborhood of $47,000.

This was the committee that set up among other things, as the gentleman knows, the so-called Watchdog Committee on Foreign Aid, which I think under the direction of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORGAN] is doing an outstanding job in uncovering some of the wastes and inefficiencies in the foreign program. Obviously, that committee has to be staffed, and that is the reason for the requested increase. I would like, however, to pay tribute to Mr. MORGAN, who was acting chairman last year and is chairman this year, for the splendid leadership he has given this committee. The committee has a long record of turning money back to the Treasury.

Mr. GROSS. I have no intention of objecting to the appropriation of this amount of money, but I would like to be assured that there are plenty of counterpart funds, if it is possible to obtain that assurance, in the various countries of the world so that this being an off year there will be plenty available for the junketing Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXPENSES OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 143), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That in carrying out its duties during the Eighty-sixth Congress, the Committee on the District of Columbia is authorized to incur such expenses (not in excess of $10,000) as it deems advisable. Such expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 146), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That effective January 3, 1959, the expenses of investigations and studies to be made pursuant to H. Res. 130 by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs (now comprised of the six former Committees on Insular Affairs, Territories, Public Lands, Irrigation and Reclamation, Mines and Mining, and Indian Affairs), acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $60,000, including expenditures for the employment of stenographic and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman of such committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 148), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective from January 3, 1959, the expenses of the studies and investigations to be conducted pursuant to H. Res. 147 by the Committee on Education and Labor, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $160,000, including expenditures for the employment of investigators, attorneys, and experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, and all expenses necessary for travel and subsistence incurred by members and employees while engaged in the activities of the committee or any subcommittee thereof, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized and signed by the chairman of such committee and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The official committee reporters may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXPENSES OF A SELECT COMMITTEE

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 160), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That effective January 3, 1959, the expenses of the study and investigation to be conducted by the select committee created by H. Res. 51, not to exceed $275,000, including expenditures for the employment of investigators, attorneys, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 3, strike out "$275,000" and insert "$260,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. What is this money to be used for? Can the gentleman tell me briefly?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I would like to call on the chairman of the Committee on Small Business to outline the operations of his committee as he explained the situation before our subcommittee.

Mr. GROSS. Perhaps I can give the gentleman some idea of what I am interested in. I have read the House Small Business Committee's final report for this year in which some 29 recommendations all made for investigation and further study of the problems of small business. It seems to me that you have been studying and investigating small business for the last 18 years, and I suggest that this segment of business is being studied to death. Small business is not only getting smaller but it is being destroyed. It is going out the window.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF HOUSE SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE

Mr. PATMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the committee is well pleased with what has been done, in the last 2 years in particular. We feel like we have had accomplishments to our credit every session of the Congress since 1941 when the Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], appointed this committee for the first time. Last year, it is my belief, by reason of the activities of the House Committee on Small Business, we placed upon the statute books one of the most far reaching bills to aid and assist small business that has ever been enacted by the United States Congress. We, for the first time in history, had before us in a congressional committee all the members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. We interrogated each one individually, and each one admitted that there is no place in the present commercial banking system to supply the needs of small business for venture capital, risk capital, or long-term loans. After each of the seven members of the Board of Governors admitted that there is no place for small business to go to get adequate financing, we then called in the presidents and other officials of the banking associations, including the American Bankers Association, the Independent Bankers Association, and others, and from them we received the information for the first time for the record that there is no place for small business to go to get adequate venture capital, risk capital, or long-term loans. And, by reason of that record, which was so good and for the first time was presented in that way, the majority leader, U.S. Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON, introduced a bill in the Senate, and I and others introduced one in the House, providing for a place for small business to go. And that bill was passed. It is now being administered by the Small Business Administration. A good start has not gotten under way at the present time, but the SBA is working at it. It takes time for a new law to be put into execution, I realize that, and we are patient about it but some progress is being made, and I feel that that one act that was passed, I believe by reason of the work and the efforts of the House Small Business Committee, is the finest act that was ever passed by Congress to help small business in this country.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I will say to the gentleman I think it is about time the House Committee on Small Business was either made permanent and given authority to bring legislation to the House floor or it ought to be disbanded. I say to you that the big are getting bigger and small business is being destroyed. It is action, not further study, that is needed.

Mr. PATMAN. I concede what the gentleman says to a great extent is true, but that is not the fault of the House Small Business Committee. We have been working on it every year, and we bring these things to the attention of the Congress. And, the Congress has made many corrections, not just the one I mentioned of last year, but many more, and we are doing a fine job, I believe. This resolution has the unanimous approval of the members of the House Small Business Committee, and the acting chairman of the House Administration Committee, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FRIEDEL], advises me that it has the unanimous support of the Subcommittee on House Administration and the full Committee on House Administration. So, it has the unanimous support of three committees of the House, and I hope it is approved.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 160 is before the House for consideration and action today. It authorizes the expenditure of $260,000, to cover the expenses of the Select Committee on Small Business in carrying out its duties and responsibilities under House Resolution 51 in conducting studies and investigations of the problems of small business, particularly for the 1st session of the 86th Congress. House Resolution 160 has been sponsored unanimously by the majority and minority members of the Select Committee on Small Business, and has been reported favorably unanimously by the Committee on Administration.

In view of these circumstances, it is inconceivable that any question would be raised on the floor of the House regarding House Resolution 160. Therefore, my only purpose in addressing myself to this matter is to make sure that the Members are informed and refreshed regarding the work of the House Small Business Committee.

In general the work of the committee during the 85th Congress fell into three principal categories. They are:

First. Services rendered Members of the House in handling of inquiries and complaints involving small business problems.

Second. Investigations and studies of widely prevalent small business problems.

Third. Study of legislative proposals for solving small business problems.

The manner, quality and result of the work of the House Small Business Committee are matters of record. We are gratified with the results and happy that the House Small Business Committee is recognized as a factor in contributing to the many healthy, positive actions taken by the 85th Congress to help small business. Particular reference is made to the Small Business Investment Act of 1958. Much of the spade work in probing into the problems of small business financing preceding the approval of that law was accomplished by the House Small Business Committee. It made extensive investigations and held lengthy hearings regarding the financing of small business. A detailed report on that problem was made to the House by the House Small Business Committee—House Report No. 1889, 85th Congress.

The committee's hearings on problems of small business were notable and the reaction to them was favorable from all areas. Those hearings marked for the first time in history that all members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System appeared and testified individually and independently before a congressional committee. The information they gave the House Small Business Committee was valuable. Their testimony and testimony from the leaders of the American Bankers Association confirmed other testimony to the effect that a gap existed in the long-term and equity financing of small business which banks cannot and, according to their testimony, should not be called upon to fill. They pointed out that banks have responsibilities to depositors to avoid long-term financing operations so as to keep fairly liquid the resources the banks have on deposit. Out of all of our hearings and reports and the hearings and reports of other committees on this problem, the Congress developed and approved the Small Business Investment Act of 1958. That law is a milestone of the accomplishments in the interest of small business and our free and competitive enterprise system. Of course, it is only the first step and we recognize that the law needs improvement. The legislative proposals designed to bring about such improvement are now under study.

In addition to the work done by the House Small Business Committee in connection with the problems of small business financing, it made investigations, studies and reports respecting small-business problems widely prevalent in many industries and areas, including Government procurement, distribution practices in the petroleum industry, unfair practices in the dairy industry, unfair practices in the poultry industry, small-business problems in the aluminum industry, and shortcomings in the law enforcement activities affecting small business.

On all of these activities the committee made a report and an accounting to the House of Representatives when it submitted its final report January 3, 1959—House Report No. 2718. In that connection I would like to call to the attention of the Members a letter which we have received regarding that report. The letter is from one of the leading members of the faculty in the graduate school of business, Stanford University. It is as follows:

The annual report which the House Select Committee on Small Business printed recently is of such superior quality that I am planning to use it as one of the basic research studies in my second year graduate course numbered business 307 dealing with managerial economics. It effectively and realistically presents the challenge and problems of small business. It is particularly good in marking out what the role of Government can be in strengthening free, private, competitive enterprise. I congratulate you as the chairman of the committee upon the quality of the spadework evidenced in this annual report. You have cast a penetrating spotlight upon some of the most difficult, practical problems now faced by small business. I feel confident that teachers and students of small business alike feel indebted to you and to your committee for providing such vital materials for their education and instruction.

In addition to that letter, we have received many other letters from representatives of the dairy industry in the Midwestern States, and from small businessmen in that industry, and from others from all over the country, expressing their gratitude to the House Small Business Committee for the work it did during the 85th Congress in the interest of small business and our free and competitive enterprise system. For the information of the Members, I include here quotations from a few of those letters:

CULHANE'S DAIRY,
January 27, 1959.

Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PATMAN: I am writing this letter to you as a small independent dairyman who appreciates your work. I think the growing trend of monopoly must be checked. The survival and future growth of small business will be more secure because of your efforts and those of other interested people. Big and great as this country is, it's nice to know that someone is thinking of the little fellow.

Very truly yours,

D. E. CULHANE,
Manager.

SANITARY DAIRY PRODUCTS, INC.,
Minden, La., January 30, 1959.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PATMAN: I wish to express my appreciation to you for including us in your mailing list of "Price Discrimination in the Distribution of Dairy Products." If possible I would like to have six extra copies and would be more than glad to pay all costs.

We are vitally interested in these hearings and in having our Senators and Congressmen know the story of the milk industry. We are interested in this case as we have had a similar experience in the State of Louisiana.

We attempted to do something about this condition by getting a law passed, Act No. 193, at the 1958 session of the Louisiana Legislature. Now the law has been contested by Borden Co. and Foremost Dairies, in Federal court. Federal Judge J. Shelly Wright, of New Orleans, La., has granted a temporary injunction to prevent the enforcement of the act.

We deeply appreciate your interest and concern for the small milk operator and urge you to use your influence to see that these conditions are corrected. We are not asking the Government to keep us in business if we cannot meet fair competition, but to correct unfair conditions as found in your conclusions on page 32 of the report.

This is of great importance, not only in this case, but all over the United States, in order that a few large concerns will not monopolize the milk industry as has happened in other industries.

Thanking you for including us and wishing you continued success in your work, I am,

Yours truly,

E. LEROY MILLER,
Manager.

REITER & HARTER, INC.,
Akron, Ohio, January 26, 1959.

Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Small Business,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PATMAN: I wish to take this opportunity of thanking you for the work and effort that your committee has put into the report on the price discrimination in the distribution of dairy products.

It certainly gives us hope that the independent milk dealer will not vanish like the American Indian, from the industrial scenes of America.

We are using your report to bring to the attention of our legislature in the State of Ohio some of the forces which are causing the rapid numerical decrease of dealers in the dairy industry.

Again, we appreciate your fine cooperation in helping us little fellows.

Very truly yours,

HAROLD F. REITER.

OWEN'S DAIRY,
Englewood, Colo., February 2, 1959.

The Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN,
U.S. Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PATMAN: I have just finished reading the report of the investigation conducted by the House Small Business Committee regarding the unfair trade practices in the dairy industry. You, as chairman of the subcommittee, should be commended for the outstanding job done in this investigation.

I only hope that the recommendations of the committee will be carried out by Congress. The unfair trade practices being carried on by the large concerns in the dairy industry are some of the major threats to our free enterprise system in these United States.

Congratulations on your work to date—and keep up the good work.

Respectfully,

PAUL R. MILLER.

OHIO VALLEY DAIRY,
Martins Ferry, Ohio, January 29, 1959.

The Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Please accept my sincerest congratulations and those of all independent dairymen in the State for Ohio for your outstanding work in connection with the report of the House Small Business Committee on unfair trade practices in the dairy industry.

We deeply appreciate your interest in our problems because we realize that the future of all independent business today depends upon the courage and determination of men like yourself.

Sincerely,

A. L. WEISKIRCHER,
Director, National Independent Dairy Association.

O'NEIL DAIRY CO., INC.,
Ames, Iowa, February 9, 1959.

Representative WRIGHT PATMAN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PATMAN: I wish to express my appreciation of the work you are doing in behalf of small business. If small business can be protected from unfair competition it will be in the race for survival. Otherwise its days are numbered. Thank you.

Yours very truly,

C. J. O'NEIL.

Also for the information of the Members, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to revise and extend my remarks by inserting at this point a statement of the summary of the work of the House Small Business Committee during the 85th Congress, including the listing of its reports.

The materials referred to are as follows:

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 86TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION—SUMMARY OF THE WORK OF THE COMMITTEE DURING THE 85TH CONGRESS

GENERAL

In general, the work of the committee fell in three principal categories.

1. Services rendered in the handling of inquiries and complaints.

2. Investigations and studies of widely prevalent small-business problems.

3. Study of legislative proposals for solving small-business problems.

The work performed in each of these categories is found explained in further detail as follows:

SERVICES RENDERED TO THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE IN HANDLING OF INQUIRIES AND COMPLAINTS

Representatives and owners of small-business firms located throughout the country are, for the most part, without knowledge of the organization of agencies of the Federal Government having responsibility respecting small business. Therefore, when these small-business firms want information about what assistance is available to them through Government agencies and how to go about contacting such agencies, they usually direct their inquiries either to their Representatives in the Congress or directly to the House Small Business Committee.

In many instances, these inquiries and complaints have been received by Members of the House from small-business firms which alleged that they were being mistreated and damaged as a result of trade practices used by their large competitors. In other instances, these firms without knowledge of the procedures of the executive agencies respecting defense contracts or loan applications, became hopelessly tangled in red-tape.

The staff of the committee from day to day throughout the 85th Congress carried a heavy workload of casework. The term "casework" is used to identify those problems pertaining to small business which were referred to the Small-Business Committee principally by Members of the House. In the handling of each of these day-to-day problems, the committee and its staff operated as a service agency for the Members. In doing so it served as a special link between the Members and parties from whom information was needed. Frequently the needed factual information was secured from agencies of the executive branch of the Government. Occasionally it was obtained from offices of large corporations. In each instance the committee located the proper source, secured the pertinent data, arranged for appropriate consideration of the small-business concern's problem, and thereafter reported to the interested Member. Since the beginning of the 85th Congress the committee has handled 707 cases from 235 Members of the House regarding problems of small business, and some of them involved such knotty problems as to require the members of the staff to devote a substantial part of their time in handling them to completion.

In addition to the handling of these cases, thousands of inquiries were received requiring response merely by letter or telephone.

The committee made extensive investigations, studied, and considered each of the following problems:

1. Financing of small business (H. Rept. 1889).
2. The facts about interlocking directorates (H. Rept. 1278).
3. Alleged monopolistic practices and conditions in the iron and steel scrap industry (ch. IX, H. Rept. 2718).
4. Price discrimination in the dairy industry (H. Rept. 2713).
5. Antitrust policies and their relation to small business (ch. VII, H. Rept. 2718).
6. Enforcement of laws affecting small business (H. Rept. 2714).
7. The administration of the Small Business Act (ch. V, H. Rept. 2718).
8. Effect of Government procurement policy on small business (ch. VI, H. Rept. 2718).
9. Competitive practices and conditions in the aluminum industry and their effect on small business (H. Rept. 2716).
10. Competitive practices and conditions in the aircraft industry and their effect on small business (ch. XII, H. Rept. 2718).
11. Distribution practices in the petroleum industry and their effect on small business (H. Rept. 1157).
12. The effect of the policies of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers on small-business firms (H. Rept. 1710).
13. Competitive practices and conditions in the poultry industry and their effect on small business (H. Rept. 2717).
14. Complaints of small and independent businessmen operating sightseeing businesses in the District of Columbia (H. Rept. 2681 and a special report by the chairman to the chairman of the House District Committee).

In addition to these investigations and studies, the committee, while it did not hold hearings on the subject, gave serious and extended study to the impact of the Federal tax structure on small-business enterprise. As a result of those studies, the Members of the committee urged that legislation be enacted which would relieve small business from some of the heavy burden of Federal taxes. (The attached exhibit A contains a complete listing of all reports made by the committee during the 85th Congress. Also attached is exhibit B containing a complete listing of all hearings held by the committee and its subcommittees during the 85th Congress).

STUDY OF LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS FOR SOLVING SMALL-BUSINESS PROBLEMS

The members of the committee and its staff devoted a considerable amount of effort and time to the study and analysis of the need for new legislation to help small business. As a result of these efforts, a number of bills were introduced by members of the House Small Business Committee and by other Members of the House. When these bills were under consideration by the legislative and standing committees, members of the House Small Business Committee testified about the small-business problems involved. Otherwise, assistance was rendered by members of the House Small Business Committee and its staff to the legislative and standing committees, as requested, in the study and consideration of many of these proposals.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is what I understood, but I was not sure.

Mr. PATMAN. That is correct.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there is any way, in the printing of these copies of Washington's Farewell Address, that we might underscore the statements which our first President made repeatedly with respect to foreign intrigues and our entangling alliances with foreign countries, and also his warnings about incurring debt on the part of the Federal Government. CONSIDERATION OF CONSENT CALENDAR BILLS

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a statement of the procedure which the members of the majority and minority objectors committees on the Consent Calendar will follow in the consideration of bills on the Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to follows:

On January 15 and on February 18, respectively, the majority and minority floor leaders appointed their respective personnel of the objectors committees, Mr. MCCORMACK, the gentleman from Massachusetts, appointing three members of his party and Mr. HALLECK, the gentleman from Indiana, appointing three members of his party. The objectors committees are unofficial committees of the House of Representatives, existing at the request and at the pleasure of the respective floor leaders of the two parties who, in order to facilitate the proper screening of legislation which may be placed on the Consent Calendar, designate Members of each side of the aisle charged with the specific responsibility of seeing to it that legislation passing by such procedure is in the interest of good government. The rule which is applicable to Consent Calendar procedure is rule 746 of the House Rules and Manual, found on pages 373, 374, and 375 of the Rules of the House of Representatives. The operation of such procedure is described on pages 95, 134, 135, 136, 173, and 327 of Cannon's Procedures in the House of Representatives.

For several sessions now objectors on both sides of the aisle have followed certain rules for consideration of Consent Calendar bills which they have made known to the Members at the beginning of a session. These rules are not publicized at this time to establish hard and fast procedures but rather to advise the Members of the House as to the manner in which the committee plans to operate throughout the 86th Congress. The members of the committees feel: That generally no legislation should pass by unanimous consent which involves an aggregate expenditure of more than $1 million; second, that no bill which changes national policy or international policy should be permitted to pass on the Consent Calendar but rather should be afforded the opportunity of open and extended debate; third, that any bill which appears on the Consent Calendar, even though it does not change national or international policy, or does not call for an expenditure of more than $1 million, should not be approved without the membership being fully informed of its contents, providing it is a measure that would apply to the districts of a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives, in which case the minimum amount of consideration that should be given such a bill would be clearance by the leadership of both parties before being brought before the House on the Consent Calendar—it has been the policy of the objectors on the Consent Calendar heretofore to put such a bill over without prejudice one or more times to give an opportunity to the Members to become fully informed as to the contents of such a bill, and the Consent Calendar objectors for the 86th Congress wish to follow like procedure; fourth, that if a bill has been placed on the Consent Calendar and the members of the committee having jurisdiction over the legislation show that it has not been cleared by the Bureau of the Budget, by the respective departments affected by such legislation, or that such reports from the committee or from the department show that the legislation is not in accord with the President's program, it should not pass on the Consent Calendar but that the chairman of the House committee having jurisdiction over the legislation should either call it up under Suspension of the Rules with the permission of the Speaker or should go to the Rules Committee for a rule for such legislation. While the members of the objectors committees feel that a report from the Bureau of the Budget is necessary before a bill should be placed upon the Consent Calendar, they do not wish to take the position that the report from the Bureau of the Budget must necessarily show the approval of such legislation by the Bureau. However, if such approval is not shown, then in the consideration of the legislation, even if considered on the Consent Calendar, the chairman reporting the bill, or the sponsor of the bill, should be willing to accept the responsibility of stating to the Members the action of the Budget of the Bureau and the reasons for such action.

The members of the Consent Calendar objectors committee also feel it fair to state to the membership that it is not their purpose to obstruct legislation or to object to bills or pass them over without prejudice because of any personal objection to said bill or bills by any one member or all of the members of the Consent Calendar objectors committee, but rather that their real purpose, in addition to expending legislation, is to protect the membership against having bills passed by unanimous consent which, in the opinion of the objectors any Member of the House might have objection to. The members of the Consent Calendar objectors committee earnestly request that the chairmen of the standing committees of the House having the responsibility for bringing legislation before the House take into consideration the contents of this statement before placing bills on the Consent Calendar. While it is not absolutely necessary that the sponsors of bills appearing on the Consent Calendar contact the various members of the Consent Calendar objectors committee, nevertheless, in the interest of saving time and avoiding the possibility of having bills laid over unnecessarily, it is good practice to do so; and the objectors welcome the continuance of the procedure of getting in touch with them at least 24 hours before the legislation is called up under the regular Consent Calendar procedure. In many instances such thoughtfulness on the part of the sponsors will clear away questions which the objectors have and consequently will make for the expeditious handling of legislation.

FEDERAL HIGHWAYS

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced H.R. 4875, to amend the Federal Highway Act of 1958. I think that this bill is of sufficient importance to call it to the attention of the Members of the House.

Subsection (d) of section 109 of the present law provides that pavement markings "shall be subject to the approval of the State highway department with the concurrence of the Secretary—Commerce—who is directed to concur only in such installations as will promote the safe and efficient utilization of the highways."

The Secretary of Commerce, acting through the Bureau of Public Roads, has prescribed that all highway center lines shall be white. At least a substantial portion of the markings in Wyoming were changed from yellow to white.

When the Wyoming State Legislature convened in its biennial session, a bill was introduced on January 13, 1959, subsequently passed by the legislature and signed by the Governor, to require that all center markings and supplementary road shoulder markings be in bright yellow, the color previous used for such pavement markings. The margin by which this bill was passed would seem to indicate a clear-cut sentiment that the white markings are not suitable to the local driving conditions, where blowing snow or ground blizzards are enccuntered in some areas during the winter months, and that such white lines detract from the safety, rather than promote safety.

On my inquiry to the Bureau of Public Roads, it was ruled that the carrying out of such law would deny to the State of Wyoming further Federal-aid funds.

The Wyoming State Legislature adjourned on February 21, but shortly before doing so amended the act previously passed to provide that the State highway commission, after a hearing, may waive the application of the act to any highway or highway project, if necessary, to promote a safe and effective utilization of such highway or highway project.

I then introduced H.R. 4875. I sincerely hope that the Public Works Committee will hold hearings on this bill and give full consideration to it. In that manner, the burden would be placed squarely upon the Bureau of Public Roads to show that standardization of the color of pavement markings is essential to promoting the safe and efficient utilization of the highways. If this burden cannot be clearly satisfied, then as a matter of States rights and in the interest of protecting the safety of the traveling public under local driving conditions, I think the bill should be passed.

There is one thing for which I think we can all be thankful. That is that we are here concerned with the color of the stripe that will be placed upon our inanimate public roads, and not upon our public schools or the children of America. This action certainly belies the representation by some that Federal funds do not mean Federal control.

AFL–CIO

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, down in Puerto Rico, George Meany, Walter Reuther, and company are luxuriating in one of the world's more expensive hotels and issuing almost daily statements concerning the poor, the underprivileged, and the unemployed.

Indeed, Mr. Reuther has been so bold as to criticize President Eisenhower for the latter's conference in Acapulco with the President of Mexico. This, ostensibly, was too rich for Walter's blood.

I think it particularly interesting that such declarations from the boss of the United Auto Workers come at a time when his own union's newspaper, Solidarity, is devoting its entire front page to three stories: One describes the UAW program for handling the tragic problem of unemployment, the second urges Congress to support the UAW plan and states that Russia is better than the United States in just about every respect, and the third calls for an increase of $1 a month in union dues to replenish UAW's staggering strike fund.

Times may be tough for the UAW and other workers, but are not for the union bosses. Down in San Juan, the sun is warm and the accommodations are excellent. Besides, the working man and nonworking man about whom Meany, Reuther and company express such dolorous concern, are footing the bill.

But, Mr. Speaker, their views on welfare-state legislation are not the principal reason for my taking this time today. Rather, it is a statement by the AFL–CIO Executive Council on Labor-Management Reform Legislation. It was issued from the comfortable vantage point of San Juan February 17 to the Members of Congress who, perforce, must toil in cooler climes.

In brief, the council calls upon the Senate and this body to enact the Kennedy-Ervin bill and to junk any and all legislation which may bring erring union bosses into line.

The statement also points out that the Kennedy-Ervin bill is practically the same as the Kennedy-Ives measure, which was killed by a vote in this body during the closing minutes of the 85th Congress.

Perhaps the most alarming thing about the council's statement was the following quote:

> Again, just as last year, the administration is seeking to make political capital by defeating the bill and blaming the Democrats and the labor movement. This cynical maneuver did not fool the voters last year, nor will it deceive the Congress this year.

I think it obvious that Meany, Reuther, and all those on the council who do their bidding have been stricken rather seriously with acute amnesia.

Indeed, the Kennedy-Ives bill was opposed by this chameleonlike group after it passed the Senate. Speaking for the AFL–CIO on the subject, Meany said:

> The fallacy of writing legislation on the Senate floor has never been more clearly proven than in this instance. * * * As a result, S. 3974 (the Kennedy-Ives bill) as adopted last night by the Senate, contains provisions which we are certain will prove unworkable; which we know are unwise; provisions which are clearly unfair and unduly repressive.

I find it extremely difficult to understand why these sun-basking gentlemen who found the Kennedy-Ives bill so unworkable, unwise, unfair, and repressive could have given it such strong support.

The truth is, of course, that Meany, Reuther, and the council realized they could make political hay by covertly working for the defeat of the measure while overtly praising it more generously than they had any other bill in the past several years. The Meany-Reuther hierarchy, in order to take full advantage of this deceitful plan, sought, and is still seeking to blame the Republican Party for defeat of the Kennedy-Ives bill.

But Meany, Reuther, the AFL–CIO Council, and every Member of this body should know Democrats—not Republicans—killed the bill.

I served as a member of the Labor and Education Committee last session, and believe I can speak from firsthand knowledge when I say it was the Democrat leadership of this body which held the Kennedy-Ives bill on the Speaker's desk for 40 days and 40 nights as the 85th Congress drew to a close in a transparent, but successful, effort to guarantee the death of the measure.

I may also remind Meany, Reuther, and the council that the Democrat members of the Labor and Education Committee voted unanimously against reporting the Kennedy-Ives bill to the floor.

It may refresh the memory of those who are luxuriating in Puerto Rico to know, in fact, that Democrat members of the Labor Committee gave greater support to the administration reform bill than they did to Kennedy-Ives.

It also, perhaps, would be helpful for them to recall that in the dying minutes of the last session of Congress, the Democrat leadership of this body called the Kennedy-Ives bill up for a vote under a suspension of the rules. Because this procedure calls for a two-thirds vote, rather than a simple majority, for passage, the maneuver practically guaranteed defeat of the bill. Even had this procedure not been followed, however, the bill would have been killed. It did not receive a simple majority.

I call attention again to the phrase in the council statement which refers to a "cynical maneuver," and ask whether that phrase is applicable to the fact that many of the Democrats who voted against reporting the Kennedy-Ives bill to the floor supported it when it was called up under a suspension of the rules.

Unfortunately, what did help fool the voters last year was the cynical claim made then and now by the AFL–CIO and which I believe I have just disproved—that the Republican Party defeated labor-management reform legislation.

I can only assume that too much time spent in the sun at San Juan has had its debilitating effect upon Meany, Reuther, and the council.

They should know that such dangerous exposure is risked, proverbially, only by mad dogs and Englishmen.

NATIONAL RECREATIONAL AREA

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CARNAHAN] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include Senate Resolution 33, Missouri State Senate, Jefferson City, Mo., memorializing the Congress of the United States to establish a national recreational area on the Current and Eleven Point Rivers as proposed by the National Park Service and the U.S. Forest Service and to declare the Current and Eleven Point Rivers national streams and to provide for the acquisition of the necessary land without exercising the power of eminent domain:

SENATE RESOLUTION 33

> Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to establish a national recreational area on the Current and Eleven Point Rivers as proposed by the National Park Service and the U.S. Forest Service and to declare the Current and Eleven Point Rivers national streams and to provide for the acquisition of the necessary land without exercising the power of eminent domain
> Whereas there exists, in the valleys of the Current and Eleven Point Rivers in Missouri, five springs of the first magnitude and many hundreds of smaller springs which provide a constant supply of clear, cold, sparkling water for these rivers; and
> Whereas the phenomenon of such large volumes of clear, cold water issuing as springs amid rustic and picturesque surroundings, make places of wonder and rare natural beauty, which offer a lure and inspiration to those who come to view these extraordinary manifestations of nature, and to play, rest, and to refresh themselves in a peaceful and inspiring environment; and
> Whereas these springs make a valuable contribution to fish life in these streams by providing favorable sites for fish hatcheries, and by discharging large quantities of crystal-clear water, they become the controlling factor favorable to the propagation and maintenance of gamefish and other aquatic life natural to both streams; and
> Whereas the State of Missouri and the U.S. Forest Service own vast acreage adjacent to these streams suitable for recreational development and other improvements for the public use; and
> Whereas the Current and Eleven Point Rivers are nationally famous for their "John Boat" float fishing trips through this Ozark scenic wonderland; and
> Whereas the Arkansas-White-Red Basins, interagency committee, recognizing the unique natural qualities of the Current and Eleven Point Rivers of Missouri, and their importance to present and future generations, recommended that appropriate State and Federal agencies prepare a plan to preserve and enhance the natural qualities of this region; and

Where as a plan was prepared by the National Park Service in cooperation with Missouri State agencies, and was published by the division of resources and development, to preserve and develop the Current and Eleven Point River country, without the exercise of the power of eminent domain; and

Whereas the United States Forest Service has indicated a similar interest in the preservation and development of land adjacent to these streams by recommending the creation of a national forest recreation area in a national recreation plan prepared and adopted in 1936: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Missouri Senate in its 70th general assembly, request of the Congress of the United States, that it establish a national recreation area along the Current and Eleven Point Rivers of Missouri, and that it declare the Current and Eleven Point Rivers as national streams; and be it further

Resolved, That this assembly request that the Congress enact the necessary legislation providing for the purchase and development of the national recreation area as heretofore described, lest the great scenic and recreational values of the Current and Eleven Point Rivers in Missouri be lost forever to public use by manmade encroachments; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be instructed to send copies of this memorial to the President of the U.S. Senate, to the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, and to the Missouri Members of the House and Senate.

DR. O. C. ADERHOLD NAMED TO SOUTH'S HALL OF FAME

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to learn that Dr. O. C. Aderhold, president of the University of Georgia, has been named to the South's Hall of Fame for the Living, an honor limited to 200 living southerners.

Dr. Aderhold well deserves this high honor, for he has long been an outstanding leader in the field of education, and he has made vast contributions to his native State of Georgia and to the Nation.

From the time that Omer Clyde Aderhold started his career in education as a teacher in Jefferson, Ga., in 1923, he has repeatedly been called upon to assume positions of increased responsibility. Only through ability and devotion to duty could he have achieved this outstanding record of service.

Within a short time after Dr. Aderhold started teaching, he served as both principal and superintendent of this same high school. He then became an associate professor of education, and later a professor of education at the University of Georgia. Dr. Aderhold was named as dean of the College of Education, University of Georgia, in 1946. He has made great contributions to agriculture and to vocational education, and he has worked actively toward the achievement of a better balanced program for agriculture and industry.

Following this distinguished career of 27 years of service to education, including service as president of the Georgia Education Association, Dr. Aderhold was highly honored and again asked to assume increased responsibility when he became president of the University of Georgia in 1950. His unselfish and devoted efforts are reflected in the great achievements of the University of Georgia since that time.

Although his responsibilities in these positions have been extensive, he is the author and coauthor of numerous books and publications which will long continue to be of great value, and he has written many articles for national magazines. Dr. Aderhold has maintained a high sense of civic responsibility and has participated and given leadership to the work of numerous organizations which are dedicated to the improvement of the individual and of our local communities.

At this time, when great emphasis is being placed upon the importance of the proper training of our young people, it is especially appropriate that a man who has contributed so greatly to our educational progress, community betterment, agricultural and industrial progress should be named to the South's Hall of Fame for the Living.

At this point I wish to include two articles from the Athens, Ga., Banner-Herald, one dated January 14, 1959, and one dated February 10, 1959.

The articles follow:

[From the Athens (Ga.) Banner-Herald, Jan. 14, 1959]

ADERHOLD NOMINATED FOR SOUTH'S HALL OF FAME FOR LIVING

DECATUR, GA.—Dr. O. C. Aderhold, president of the University of Georgia, has been nominated for the South's Hall of Fame for the Living, an honor group limited to 200 living southerners for the 1959 additions.

Hubert F. Lee, founder of the South's Hall of Fame for the Living said that any friends of Dr. Aderhold who wish to second the nomination may write a letter to him telling why Dr. Aderhold should be so honored. Letters should be addressed to:

Hubert F. Lee, founder, South's Hall of Fame for the Living, 4592 Covington Road, Decatur, Ga.

"The Man of the South" is selected each year from the 200 on the honor group.

Some of those who have been honored as "Man of the South" have included Bishop Arthur J. Moore, Bobby Jones and the late Senator Walter F. George.

The honor group already numbers among its membership Abit Nix and Dean John Drewry. Lee installed Dean Drewry into the Hall of Fame at the 25th anniversary meeting of Sigma Delta Chi.

Abit Nix, a past grand master of Georgia Masons, was installed in 1956 at his home Mount Vernon Lodge 22 when the grand master of Georgia presented him with the past grand master's jewel and friends gathered to honor Mr. Nix. The report from the Athens Banner-Herald was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Representative PAUL BROWN. Lee is a 32d degree mason.

Lee is editor of the magazine Dixie Business, which he started, in 1929. Because of Lee's friendship for the University of Georgia, he was recently invited to membership in the University of Georgia Alumni Society.

[From the Athens (Ga.) Banner-Herald, Feb. 10, 1959]

THE LATE ROBERT L. M. PARKS

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the South and the Nation have sustained a great loss in the death of Robbert L. M. Parks, editor of the Augusta Chronicle. He was one of the outstanding editors of the country, a devoted father and a loyal friend. Many of his editorials have been reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and by other newspapers throughout the country.

Bob Parks was known as a gentle and sincere man who was kind and thoughtful, and he was possessed of a keen mind. Prior to becoming editor of the Augusta Chronicle he had a large following as a sports editor and continued to have a lasting interest in sports.

He had a deep affection for his hometown of Augusta, and as an editorial in the Augusta Herald states, "He wanted progress for his community and he worked for it in the best way he knew how—through the pungent and truthful words of his editorial columns."

I wish to include at this point an editorial from the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle of Saturday, February 21, 1959, in memory of this great editor:

ROBERT LEE MCALLISTER PARKS

The death of Robert Lee McAllister Parks, editor of the Chronicle, has saddened the city of Augusta.

Few men were as widely loved as was Mr. Parks. His sincerity, his gentleness, his genuine interest in the problems of others, his devotion to religion and to his family, his deep love for Augusta—all these things were combined in a man of unusual character, dignity, and ability. As a friend said yesterday, he lived by the Golden Rule and toward all he showed kindness and consideration. He had a great gift for friendship.

Few men are able to attain the serenity that was such a marked quality in Mr. Parks. Quiet-spoken, exemplifying in every way the meaning of the word "gentleman," he was, nevertheless, a man of strong convictions. These convictions he was ever ready to sustain, both in his personal life and in his editorial work.

In his professional work he was recognized as one of the South's outstanding editors and outside the South even, his distinguished editorials commanded attention. They were often reprinted in leading newspapers of the country and his editorial views were frequently requested in national surveys of editorial opinion. Many of his editorials have been reprinted also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the request of Members of the U.S. Senate and the National House of Representatives because of the vigorous manner in which they emphasized American principles or made keen analytical comments on current issues.

But here in Augusta he will be long remembered not alone because of his distinguished editorial contributions in a disturbed period of the Nation's history but, particularly, because of his fine qualities as a man and as a citizen, always ready to give of his best to help in making Augusta a better and more progressive city.

He will be missed by many. None will feel a keener sense of loss than do his associates at the Augusta Chronicle.

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the board of governors of the American Bar Association has presented to the membership through its house of delegates, a report obsessed with security and oblivious of individual liberty. With nothing more than a dogmatic assertion that our internal security has been weakened by judicial decisions, the ABA committee recommends a reversal of a number of decisions of the Supreme Court and seeks to substitute its own judgment for that of the Supreme Court. It is most unseemly for the Special Committee of the American Bar Association on Communist Tactics and Strategy to charge that the Court has "encouraged an increase in Communist activities and created a widespread public impression that resort to the judicial process is the means whereby subversives will be freed to go forth and further undermine our Nation."

This is a maligning of the Supreme Court which is most irresponsible. I say this in the light of the fact that the Communist Party has been reduced to a membership of 5,000 members in the United States and that subversion is under effective control by the FBI and other agencies while this committee would castigate the Supreme Court for its studied opinions and judgments. Again some members of the American Bar Association are seeing Communists under every bed. It is anomalous that we heard not even a peep out of them when the late Senator McCarthy uttered his diatribes that did much to corrode our liberties. They were then strangely silent.

Exception is vigorously taken to some of the decisions of the Court.

First, as to the Nelson case. Suffice it to say now that the legislative reversal of the Nelson case and the enforcement of 44 States and Territorial laws dealing with the same problem will not benefit the internal security of this country one iota. What it will do is take a problem national in scope and indivisible in character and by subjecting it to a multitude of law-enforcement agencies make it impossible for any one of them to deal with it effectively. What the Supreme Court said in this case was in affirmation of the decision of the highest court of the State of Pennsylvania, yet the committee aims no shaft at the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Secondly, the ABA committee would like to restore the broad power arrogated by the Secretary of State in passport procedures. I say if we follow that advice this House will be trampling upon the constitutional right to travel of American citizens.

Third, the ABA committee suggests that the Congress make theoretical advocacy as well as incitement to action subject to punitive provisions of the Smith Act. If this House adopts that ill-conceived advice we will be engaged in a futile legislative exercise since there is grave doubt as to whether any court would enforce such a sweeping provision.

May I suggest that my fellow members of the ABA take a long, hard look at the proposals of their committee with a view toward achieving a position consonant with both individual liberties and the realities of subversion.

PORTLAND RACKETS DEALT ANOTHER BLOW

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, 2 years ago the mayor of Portland, the Honorable Terry Schrunk, was the focus of headlines all over the Nation. On the basis of testimony by an admitted Portland nightlife figure, Mayor Schrunk was accused of a great many things, and the accusations were headlined in the press. Many months later, when a jury of his peers, operating in the calm atmosphere of a courtroom, found Terry Schrunk innocent of the charges leveled at him, the publicity given to his acquittal was, to say the least, rather restrained.

In the last year, Mayor Schrunk, now free to carry out his duties, has waged an unremitting war on the narcotics peddlers who were so anxious to keep him out of office. The publicity given to this effort has been still less than that received by his acquittal. In the interests of fair play, I think it might interest the House to read the following editorial from the Sellwood-Moreland Bee of January 22, 1959, a Portland newspaper:

PORTLAND RACKETS DEALT ANOTHER BLOW

Perhaps some of the anguish which Terry Schrunk and his family went through after he became a candidate for the office of mayor of Portland was repaid last week when headlines revealed that the hold of a Portland narcotics ring has been broken.

Mayor Schrunk, pilloried during his campaign and after he took office because he was the known foe of all criminals, did not have too long to wait for the vindication. Recent news stories point up the truth that Portland's "bankrollers" are not just innocent purveyors of good times for those who stay up after the usual hours. Mayor Schrunk's leadership in the city and his administration of the police department under a chief who will not tolerate "protection" have resulted in the exposure of and apprehension of some of the city's toughest and most vicious criminals, the narcotics peddlers. This has been accomplished in just a little over 2 years—an amazing record for reform in a town that had become known coast to coast for its rackets.

With each month that passes the people of Portland have a better opportunity to understand what actually happened in Portland and why. The truth is being revealed. Let's hope that those who were blind to it are now willing to face the facts and lend their support to the fight, because the battle is not yet won. Criminals do not give up easily. Neither should citizens.

THE WORKERS BILL OF RIGHTS ACT OF 1959

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a summary of a bill I introduced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, on February 16, I introduced two bills, the first H.R. 4473 and the second H.R. 4474. The first is a so-called antiracketeering bill. The second bill relates to the Taft-Hartley Act amendments.

I am including herewith a summary of H.R. 4473, which is known as the Workers Bill of Rights Act of 1959. This is a summary of each provision of the bill I referred to as having introduced on February 16.

The duty to enact effective labor law reform legislation is one of the most serious responsibilities of this Congress. The people of this country have been shocked by the startling disclosures of corruption, gangsterism, racketeering, embezzlement of union funds and property, and denial of the basic rights of union members, which have come to their attention as a result of the McClellan hearings and other investigations.

We know that the millions of American workers who are fine, upright American citizens look to us for effective labor legislation—legislation that will restore the authority and control of their affairs to the members of labor organizations and employees who are represented by labor organizations, where it rightfully belongs, but where today in some of our largest labor organizations it rests only in theory.

Some of our largest and most powerful unions are under the complete control and domination of corrupt leaders who exercise their vast powers for their own personal aggrandizement, with utter disregard of the interests and welfare of the public and with arrogant contempt for the basic rights of millions of American working men and women.

Those corrupt labor leaders of whom I speak have entrenched themselves in power and have imposed upon the workers they represent dictatorial economic governments, the constitutions of which bristle with provisions which shackle the workers and deny to them the exercise of those basic rights which are the birthright of every American citizen.

The bill which I have introduced today, if enacted into law by this Congress, will wrest the control of these unions from the gangsters, hoodlums, and racketeers, and restore to the workers the right to control the affairs of their unions, the right to a government of laws rather than a government of tyranny imposed by gangsters, racketeers, mobsters, and power-mad demagogues.

The need for this legislation is not made less urgent because there are good labor leaders as well as bad ones any more than the need for laws against murder and treason is lessened by the fact that the vast majority of our population is made up of fine law-abiding God-fearing citizens.

SUMMARY OF THE LABOR BILL OF RIGHTS ACT OF 1959

TITLE I. A BILL OF RIGHTS FOR THE AMERICAN WORKINGMAN

I. Every labor union engaged in an activity affecting commerce shall maintain in its constitution and bylaws specific provisions guaranteeing to union members the following democratic rights:

(1) Eligibility for membership: Which requires that every employee be admitted to membership on a uniform basis.

(2) Freedom of speech, including the absolute right of every member to criticize union practices, policies, and officials.

(3) Freedom of assembly.

(4) Equal rights, including all voting rights and privileges, and equal protection of union rules.

(5) Freedom from arbitrary financial exaction, with the rate of dues and initiation fees being amended only by majority secret ballot vote.

(6) Protection of the rights to sue in any court or administrative agency, or to appear in any Federal or State judicial, administrative, or legislative proceeding.

(7) Freedom from improper disciplinary action, with no member being disciplined in any way, except for breach of a published written rule, not inconsistent with this act. Any accused shall be (a) served with a copy of this act, and the union's constitution and bylaws, (b) served with written specific charges, (c) given a reasonable time to prepare for defense, and (d) afforded all procedural due process guarantees.

(8) Participation in establishment of salaries through secret ballot majority vote.

(9) (a) Freedom of elections through secret ballot without fear of reprisal, including, if necessary, outside impartial supervision agency if requested by 10 percent of membership; (b) every member shall be entitled to become a candidate for union office.

In the latter event the court may dismiss the complaint, enter a decree approving the continuation of the trusteeship for any period not in excess of 1 additional year, or retain jurisdiction of the cause.

V. The rights and remedies provided by this title shall be in addition to any other rights and remedies at law or in equity (Federal or State), except that upon the filing of a complaint by the Secretary of Labor the jurisdiction of the Federal district court over a trusteeship shall be exclusive and the final judgment shall be res judicata.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ACT

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, there is a serious weakness in the Rural Electrification Act, which borrowers may exploit to the detriment of American manufacturers and American workers.

In the legislation governing rural electrification loans, there is generalized language directing the borrowers to buy American to the extent practicable and the cost of which is not unreasonable.

Is this cost to be determined by American standards, or by the cheap labor standards of foreign countries? The law does not say.

Most Americans will agree that any money loaned by the U.S. Government to a corporation or cooperative in this country, must be used for the purchase of manufactured articles, or materials, or supplies produced in the United States, where such items are available and where they meet the quality specifications.

The fact that foreign companies, sometimes subsidized by their own governments, are able to pay the import duties and still underbid American companies in our domestic market, should not be the determining factor where money for the purchase of such equipment or supplies, is provided out of public funds. Recent events indicate, however, that borrowers are able to circumvent the "Buy American" provisions of the law, and that the REA, in the absence of specific authority, is unable to prevent them from taking advantage of this loophole.

I give you the following cases where the General Electric Co., of Lynn, Mass., lost out to a foreign competitor. If this should become a precedent, it would place American manufacturers at a hopeless competitive disadvantage in supplying the needs of our domestic market, with serious implications for the future of these corporations and their thousands of employees.

It seems to me that the OCDM should also take an interest in these disturbing developments, in order to protect and maintain those manufacturing facilities with their skilled employees, that are indispensable to our defense.

I ask Congress, the Tariff Commission, and the OCDM to consider these facts:

The REA approved a loan to the Medina Electric Cooperative of Hondo, Tex., on September 17, 1958, in the amount of $11,480,000 for the construction of a generating plant and related facility, to provide service to 17 counties in southwest Texas. This was in addition to $2,413,000 available from a prior loan, making a total of $13,893,000 available for the construction of a 66,000-kilowatt steam generating plant and transmission facility. Of this total, $12,107,000 will be spent for the generating plant itself, including mechanical equipment, the building, sites, ground, and so forth. The turbines in question will account for approximately 14 percent of this sum, or about $1,694,000.

Medina, the borrower, requested bid proposals from a group of domestic manufacturers, including General Electric, of Lynn, Mass., plus the Brown-Boveri Co., of Switzerland. REA requires a minimum of three bids. The contract was awarded to the foreign manufacturer. It calls for two generators. A third generator will be required, and it is apparent that the Swiss company has the inside track on this bid also.

This is but the opening wedge of a practice that, unless it is stopped, could lead to a chain reaction that would disorganize our industrial economy.

I understand that the city of Los Angeles is accepting bids now for similar equipment and will probably award the contract to the Brown-Boveri Co., of Switzerland, because it will be able to underbid any American manufacturer.

This is not all. Consider the following needs and loans that may be used to purchase turbines from foreign manufacturers under the REA program:

State	Corporation	Turbine-kilowatts
Colorado	Arkansas River Valley G. and T.	22,000
Arkansas	M. & A. Electrical Power Corp.	44,000
Alaska	Golden Valley Electric	15,000
Mississippi	South Mississippi Electric Power Association.	22,000
Florida	West Florida Electric Corp.	22,000
New Mexico	Plains Electric T. & T. Corp.	33,000
South Carolina	Greenwood County Electric Corp.	22,000
Missouri	New England & Missouri Electric Power Corp.	16,500
Michigan	North Michigan Electric Power Corp.	16,500
Alaska	U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.	12,500

If we do not act promptly to reverse the loss suffered by General Electric, the door will be opened to a flood of imports that will put our turbine-manufacturing facilities out of business, and will displace thousands of American workers.

No Member of Congress can ignore the dangers inherent in this breakthrough.

Where funds of the U.S. Government are borrowed for use in this country, we must insist that the borrowers shall "buy American."

ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, Estonians form one of the oldest and smallest nationality groups in Europe who have, through their long and turbulent history, preserved their distinct national identity. They are barely more than 1,000,000, and occupy their historic land of about 18,000 square miles on the northernmost part of the three Baltic countries, the "land of the Blessed Virgin." They have lived there from time immemorial, and their history records their heroic struggles against all comers, and against often formidable odds, since their Christianization in the 12th century. They have always fought for their freedom and independence, and when they found that it was impossible to form a sovereign, independent nation, early in modern times they placed themselves and their country under the sovereignty of Sweden. Then early in the 18th century Russia conquered their country and thenceforth they became Russian subjects. For more than 200 years they endured the autocratic and oppressive regime of the czars, but during all that time they clung to their national traditions and cherished one ideal, that of attaining their freedom and independence. The opportunity came to them in the course of the First World War. When the detested czarist regime in Russia was overthrown and shattered in the Russian Revolution of 1917, Estonians felt free to declare their independence, and they did this on February 24, 1918, by a proclamation, and at the same time established the Estonian Republic.

This Republic had a remarkable but rather short life; it lasted for only two decades. In the beginning of the last war unhappy Estonians witnessed the rape and destruction of their free and independent state by the Soviet Union. This was done in 1940, and in July of that year Estonia was annexed to the Soviet empire.

Since then, freedom and independence, happiness and joy has gone out of Estonia, and the unfortunate Estonians have been suffering in the hands of their cruel Communist overlords. In their historic homeland they are imprisoned behind the Iron Curtain, and thus completely sealed off from the free world. All their worldly possessions are nationalized, and they all work under harsh conditions, for the all-powerful and soul-devouring state, run by the minions of the Kremlin for the benefit of the Kremlin. One might think that their aspirations and hopes, and their future is also tied to that of the rulers in the Kremlin. Fortunately, however, that is not so. These liberty-loving and stouthearted Estonians still cling to their high ideals of freedom and independence, and they devoutly pray for their deliverance from Communist totalitarianism. On this 41st anniversary of their independence day, I gladly join all Americans of Estonian descent and hope that their unfortunate kinsmen suffering under totalitarian dictatorship will one day attain their freedom.

REGULATION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] is recognized for 2 hours.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for time on the floor today because I believe that the 85th Congress failed in its constitutional obligation to the people of the United States when it refused to bring back to itself the regulation of our foreign commerce.

Together with other Members I have introduced a bill, H.R. 4846 that would have the effect of restoring to Congress the function that it should never have relinquished. The new bill differs from the proposals of a year ago and I believe will be given a better reception by Members of the House. My reason for saying this is that the control over trade provided for in the present bill would not draw Congress itself into the details of cases under the escape clause but would leave this to the U.S. Tariff Commission, which is an agency of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the bill is as follows:

A BILL TO REGULATE THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES BY AMENDING SECTION 350 OF THE TARIFF ACT OF 1930, AS AMENDED, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Trade Agreements Adjustment Act of 1959."

SEC. 2. Sections 6 and 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958 are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. Subsection (c) of section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, as amended (19 U.S.C., sec. 1364), is amended to read as follows:

"(c) Upon receipt of the Tariff Commission's recommendation, the President shall within thirty days proclaim such rate or rates of duty or such import quota as recommended by the Commission, unless the recommendation proposes:

"(1) A rate or rates of duty higher than the rate or rates in effect on July 1, 1934, on the product in question or, if the rate is specific or compound, then higher, with respect to the specific rate or the specific part of the compound rate, than the ad valorem equivalent of such rate in effect on July 1, 1934, except that, if the product was not imported in commercial quantities before July 1, 1934, then higher than the ad valorem equivalent of the specific or compound rate or rates applicable to the product when it was first imported in commercial quantities subsequent to that date; or

"(2) An import quota that would reduce the import volume (measured by quantity if satisfactory statistics are available, otherwise by value) to a share of the domestic market for the product less than the share of such market supplied by the imports of such product during the year preceding the date when the concession was granted thereon in a trade agreement since 1934, except that, if more than one concession was granted, the year preceding the date when the principal concession was granted shall be selected. For purposes of this Act, a binding of a duty at a specified level in a trade agreement shall be regarded as a concession. For the purposes of establishing an import quota, a binding of an item on the free list in a trade agreement shall be regarded as a concession.

"Should the Commission's recommendation with respect to the rate or rates of duty or import quota fall within the specifications of paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection, the President may decline to proclaim the recommendation if, within thirty days after its receipt, he finds and publicly reports as a fact that promulgation thereof would—

"(A) impair the national defense by reducing imports of the product in question to a quantity inadequate for the establishment or maintenance of a minimum supply necessary for the national defense; or

"(B) disrupt friendly relations with countries that are principal suppliers of the product in question, if such finding is supported by the further finding—

"(i) that production of the product in question is vital to the economy of one or more of the principal supplying countries;

"(ii) that exports of the product in question represent not less than 20 per centum of the total production of such product in one or more of the principal supplying countries; and

"(iii) that exports of the product in question to the United States normally represent not less than 25 per centum of the total exports of such product from one or more of the principal supplying countries.

"Should the President decline to proclaim the recommendation of the Commission in pursuance of his finding in accordance with subparagraph (A) or (B) of this subsection, he shall, within sixty days after receiving the recommendation, proclaim in lieu thereof the rate or rates of duty, whether ad valorem or specific, in effect on July 1, 1934, on the product in question or an import quota that would not limit the import volume of the product to a share of the domestic market for the like or directly competitive product less than the share supplied by the imports thereof during the year preceding the date when the concession was granted thereon in a trade agreement since June 12, 1934. If the duty is specific or compound, it shall, with respect to the specific part thereof, be adjusted to reflect the ad valorem equivalent of such rate on July 1, 1934, or, if the product was not imported in commercial quantities before that date, then the ad valorem equivalent of such rate when the product was first imported in commercial quantities.

"The Tariff Commission shall, in each of its recommendations that proposes a rate of duty or an import quota as provided in paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection supply the President with information setting forth (a) the rate or rates of duty that were in effect on July 1, 1934, with respect to the product in question, and their ad valorem equivalent if such rate or rates were specific in whole or in part on July 1, 1934, or on the later date specified in the preceding paragraph if the product was not imported in commercial quantities before July 1, 1934; and, should the recommendation propose an import quota, then (b) the import quota that would not reduce the import volume of the product to a share of the domestic market thereof smaller than the share of such market supplied by the imports of such product during the year preceding the date when the principal concession was granted thereon in a trade agreement since 1934.

"Whenever the President declines to proclaim a recommendation of the Tariff Commission that proposes a rate of duty or an import quota as provided in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, he shall so report to the chairmen, respectively, of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, setting forth his reasons for declining to proclaim the recommendation.

"The President may negotiate compensatory concessions with the principal supplying country or countries after withdrawal or modification of the concession as provided in this subsection: Provided, That the Secretary of State certifies to the President that reciprocal and substantially equal concessions, which he shall specify, were obtained from one or more countries which shall be named, in the trade agreement or agreements in which the duty reduction of the product in question was negotiated: Provided further, That the Secretary of State further certifies to the President that such reciprocal concessions have not been seriously impaired through imposition by the principal supplying country or countries of import quotas, by establishment of import licensing systems, by currency devaluation or by other restrictive act or acts: Provided further, That the Tariff Commission finds pursuant to a public hearing conducted for the purpose, the maximum duty reduction that may be made upon any product with respect to which a compensatory concession is under consideration without causing or threatening serious injury to the domestic producers of such product: And provided further, That the President shall negotiate no compensatory concession reducing the rate or rates of duty on any proposed product below the rate or rates found by the Tariff Commission to be the minimum that will prevent serious injury to the domestic producers of the product or products upon which duty reductions may be proposed."

Mr. Speaker, I want to take a little time to point out the reason for this new legislative proposal and then to explain the simplicity of the bill to this body.

REASON FOR THE BILL

The trade agreements bill passed in 1958 did not meet the problem of import competition faced by American industry and agriculture. That problem has in the meantime not subsided but has grown in seriousness. Many industries that had not previously been menaced by low-cost imports are now feeling the impact. The outlook is for more instead of less competition, not only in the domestic market, but in the markets of the world. The competitive advantage of other countries over the producers of this country is becoming progressively more obvious.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The purpose of the bill that I, together with other Members on both sides of the aisle, have introduced, is to give greater assurance to American industry and agriculture and the workers employed, that a true remedy is available to them when import competition confronts them with loss of markets, loss of jobs, reduction of earnings, both in terms of wages and profits, and destruction of expansion possibilities. The provisions of the bill would make possible the limitation and containment of injury without a drastic reduction of imports. It would make it possible for domestic industry and agriculture, while bearing the heavy and rigid cost burdens imposed upon them, to live with import competition that is not burdened to the same degree. This would be accomplished either through tariff adjustments or the use of import quotas, according to the needs of the case, or both.

BASIS OF THE BILL

The bill would do no more than bring practice under the trade agreements program into conformity with officially avowed policy. This policy is simply that no domestic industry is to be seriously injured through the operation of the trade agreements program, and has been reiterated many times by the Presidents of the past 25 years, by our Secretaries of State, and other responsible Federal officials. These avowals and assurances have pointed repeatedly to the remedy that is avowedly available in the escape clause, and have asserted without equivocation that when a trade agreement concession granted to other countries in the form of a duty reduction or similar device results in injury to a domestic industry, a remedy is at hand in the escape clause.

It has been made clear to Congress through statements by State Department and other officials before the House Committee on Ways and Means and the Senate Finance Committee that the escape clause is in the nature of a reservation. The other signatory nations to the trade agreements understand thoroughly that we as well as they have the unquestioned right to modify or withdraw a concession if it works harm to a domestic industry. This is fully understood all around.

Invocation of the reservation therefore should revolve only around a question of fact: and that is whether the domestic industry concerned has in fact been injured.

WHAT THE BILL WOULD DO

The bill, if enacted, would carry into effect, in fact and in practice, the stated and repeatedly avowed policy of the administrators of the trade program. It would do no more. It would look to the Tariff Commission, an agency of Congress, for public hearings and the finding of fact necessary for a report to the President.

Should the Commission find injury or a threat thereof as a fact, it would propose a remedy to the President. If this proposal would not carry the tariff to a higher level in its protective effect than existed before the duty was reduced, the President would proclaim the recommended rates.

Also, if the Commission in lieu of a tariff increase, should propose imposition of an import quota that would not cut imports back to a share of the market less than the share enjoyed by them when the trade agreement was made, this would be regarded as an alternate remedy equivalent to withdrawal of the concession and would be proclaimed by the President.

Should the Commission, however, recommend a duty rate higher than the rate existing before it was reduced in a trade agreement or should it propose an import quota that would restrict imports to a lesser share of the market than was enjoyed by them when the trade agreement was made, the President might decline to place such higher restrictions into effect on the grounds that doing so would be contrary to the reservation in the trade agreement and might therefore cause resentment among the principal supplying countries of the product in question. In order to refuse the Commission's proposal, the President must certify to the existence of specified facts supporting the economic importance of the exports of the product to one or more of the principal supplying countries. He might then reject the part of the Commission's recommendation that would lie above the rate that was in effect when the duty was first cut; and similarly with a quota if one was recommended by the Commission. If the duty rate was 50 percent before a trade agreement was made, for example, and it was reduced to 25 percent or to 15 percent under the trade agreements program, and the Tariff Commission merely recommended a restoration of the 50-percent rate, this would be proclaimed by the President. Should the Commission recommend raising the rate, say to 75 percent, the President might refuse to do so under stated circumstances but would nevertheless proclaim the 50-percent rate.

The Tariff Commission's recommendation would not come to Congress itself, as was proposed in the 1958 bills that sought restoration of congressional power over the tariff.

Provision is made in the bill for compensating other countries for withdrawal of concessions but two conditions must first be met: First, the Secretary of State must certify that reciprocal concessions had actually been granted by specified countries and that such concessions had not subsequently been impaired substantially, and second, the Tariff Commission must find the peril point with respect to the item proposed for a compensatory reduction before such reduction was actually made, and the State Department would be bound by the Commission's finding. It could make no cut deeper than found by the Commission as the maximum that could be made without causing injury.

COMMENTARY ON THE BILL

It is clear that the bill would do no more than carry out the policy that has been so emphatically enunciated on numerous official occasions by members of the executive branch. It would give no occasion for any legitimate protest by any foreign country since it would take nothing away that had not been agreed to in advance in a trade agreement. A foreign country could properly complain only if it had grounds for calling into question the procedure of the Tariff Commission and the soundness of its findings. This it might do through the importing interests in this country who deal in the product as representatives of foreign exporters to this market. The Federal courts would be open to them.

There is no implication in any trade agreement that any country is to be called upon to deliver its market for any individual product to other countries without recourse. On the contrary, the trade agreements are to be mutually advantageous. They were sold to the American public in that light.

Mr. Speaker, I will quote just a few excerpts from official statements that will bear out what I have said here. The first one is from former President Roosevelt, who wrote to Congress when the act was first suggested in 1934:

The adjustment of our foreign trade relations must rest on the premise of undertaking to benefit and not to injure such interests. (See message of President Roosevelt to Congress in 1934, recommending the adoption of the trade agreements program at its inception.)

President Truman, on March 1, 1948, upon recommending another 3-year extension of the trade-agreements program, wrote to Congress, as follows:

I assured the Congress, when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was extended in 1945, that domestic producers would be safeguarded in the process of expanding trade. That commitment has been kept.

President Eisenhower in a letter to Speaker JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., and read by the Speaker on the floor on the occasion of House action on H.R. 1, February 1, 1955, said:

No American industry will be placed in jeopardy by the administration of this measure. Were we to do so, we would undermine the ideal for which we have made so many sacrifices and are doing so much throughout the world to preserve.

On April 25, 1955, President Eisenhower again expressed himself on the subject. At that time he said:

Changes which would result in the threat of serious injury to industry or general reduction in employment would not strengthen the economy of this country or the free world. (The President was speaking of tariff reductions and other trade barriers and urged that they be gradual, selective, and reciprocal. Speech before Associated Press, April 25, 1955.)

In a speech delivered March 27, 1958—State Department Bulletin, Commercial Policy Series 168, April 4, 1958—President Eisenhower continued in the same vein, upholding the policy of 24 years' standing:

So in order to dispel honest doubts about the reciprocal trade legislation's great value to the entire Nation, we should first hammer home the fact that the safeguards in the law are being strengthened to cope with uneven impacts of import competition.

Mr. Speaker, these are quotations from two former Presidents and from the present President of the United States. The statements are clear and reflect no evasiveness or secret reservations; and therefore have all the appearance of meaning what they said.

Other statements equally unambiguous and clear were made during this quarter century period by those who were directly in charge of the law's administration, and they too said that the purpose was to help American industries and not to hurt them; and that if by some mistake or as a result of an unforeseen development an industry was in fact injured or threatened with serious injury a sure remedy could be found in the escape clause.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we read the actual record under the escape clause we are driven to wonder how so wide a gulf could have developed between solemn assurances to the public no less than to the Congress, on the one hand, and actual practice on the other. On the record it is clear that since the escape clause first came into use a little over 10 years ago, it has been all but nullified by the President. Only from a fifth to one-sixth of the cases that have come before the Commission have culminated in a partial or complete restoration of the duty. The President has failed to put into effect seven unanimous recommendations of the Tariff Commission. Of some 60 cases only 10 have resulted in a remedy. These were nearly all cases of minor commercial significance; and in most of the cases favorably acted upon by the President, he diluted the recommendations of the Tariff Commission.

This is a far cry indeed from the assurances given to the public over the years with the undoubted purposes of gaining and holding support for the trade agreements program.

Mr. Speaker, we owe it to honesty in government and to fair dealing with the producers and industries of this country that have borne the brunt of import competition to set this record straight.

The present bills to amend the escape clause have this purpose and we should give them full and hearty support. We should support them not only as a matter of erasing a highly cynical record but as a means of doing what our Government has been telling the country that we have been doing but that in fact we have not been doing; namely, safeguarding the interests of our industries against the injurious effects of tariff reductions that turned sour or will turn sour in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I ask only that the facts be brought fully to light and that on these facts the Members of this House judge for themselves. There can be little question what their response will be. They will be shocked at the shameful disparity between solemn assurances and the actual record of performance. I urge all Members to study the record, both of the official statements on the escape clause and of the results of Tariff Commission hearings of cases under that clause. They owe it to their constituents to inform themselves of the facts and then to form their judgment on these very moderate bills.

Mr. Speaker, I feel confident that if the Members will do so they will give wholehearted approval to the bills that would do in fact what has so long and repeatedly been held before the public as the fundamental policy under the trade agreements program. If we cannot conform our official action to what is told to the American people by the executive branch over and over again through all means of communication, then we ought to say so to the people. As matters stand the public has been deceived by the duplicity of the executive branch over the past 25 years. The executive branch has not dared tell the truth lest its pet trade program go down in deserved defeat.

We here with these bills do not seek defeat of this trade program, but rather to make it do what the public has been told it would do and what the public has been led to believe that it would do, namely, that it would seek mutual benefits for domestic and foreign interests without doing serious injury to our industries and agriculture.

Instead of this we have opened industry after industry to disastrous competition from abroad. The only reason why more of these industries are not completely shut down is that our general prosperous situation has hidden the great competitive advantage that foreign producers enjoy in this market. Therefore the disaster that would have been visited upon us by the doubledealing engaged in by the executive branch in the administration of the trade program has merely been tempered. It has not been disposed of and lurks in the advantage of low wages paid abroad and the increasing mechanization in foreign countries.

As I said previously, Mr. Speaker, the action of the 85th Congress in extending the Trade Act for 4 years and leaving control over the tariff and foreign trade in the hands of the executive, did not solve the problem. Evidence is mounting every day that additional industries are being menaced by imports. If we are to stand by our responsibilities we must indeed respond to this threat as well as to the problem of import competition that has already developed and has been visiting distress upon our industry and labor.

I shall be happy now to yield time to other Members who may wish to express their views at this time.

I desire to call on the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. THOMSON] for a statement.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of the bill that has been introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] and explained by him, I wish to endorse what he has said.

I am tempted to at this time discuss how this has affected the industries, agriculture, jobs and expansion of my State of Wyoming and the West with which I am most familiar. I am further tempted to set forth how this has with increasing seriousness affected the jobs available to American workingmen and the future of their families.

At the proper time in this session of Congress I expect to do this. Right now I think it best to emphasize the history of this and what we and all Americans had a right to expect of the Executive.

I too have been impressed by the gulf that has separated practice from preachment in administration of the trade agreements program, particularly the escape clause.

I also agree that the 85th Congress did not produce a solution to the growing import problem. By passing the Trade Agreements Act with a 4-year extension I hope the impression was not given that this subject should now be left to lie fallow for 4 years. Since the problem to which many of us addressed ourselves in 1958 is still here, it is not too soon to start once more to do something about it.

The introduction of new bills here is a very heartening sign that the action of the 85th Congress is not regarded as foreclosing the possibility of enacting desirable legislation within the 4-year interval. In fact, I think it is a good thing that we should seek legislation that is not a part of the Trade Agreements Extension Act. We can, under these circumstances, consider modification of the act without being bedeviled by the accusation that all who would amend the act are really bent on killing the act's extension. It has long been true that many who supported amendments to the act were not seeking to prevent its extension. Nevertheless they were constantly accused of such intent by those who wanted no change in the law or wanted to eliminate or weaken even the few safeguards that it contains. All efforts to amend, they said, were but disguised efforts to kill.

Therefore, I think it is really more conducive to a more objective approach to the question of amendment when the extension of the whole act is not the issue. There can then be no confusion about the purpose of proposed amendments. It will be clear that the life of the act itself is not at stake.

Mr. Speaker, I have also been greatly impressed by the statements of the three Presidents and other executive officials to the effect that it is no part of the purpose of the trade agreements program to injure our industry, our agriculture, or our workers. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] has given some prime examples of the Presidential expressions on this subject. There are other equally official and definite statements that can be quoted. I have seen some that sound very convincing; and if those who spoke these words did not mean them, then something is wrong with their idea of statecraft and government. We are forced to believe that the statements were made in all sincerity. I shall give only a few quotations, but assure you that many more of the same kind can be supplied.

Former Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull, was the first witness who appeared before a congressional committee in 1934 to seek enactment of the trade agreements program. When he appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means of this House, where the legislation was initiated, he said:

> But in any event, whatever our Government may do in negotiating reciprocal trade arrangements, it will first see to it that they are mutually profitable and that they are not negotiated in a way that would result in injury or hurt to our own country.

This statement may be found on page 23 of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, March 1934.

Now, it might be said that Secretary Hull was speaking of injury to the country rather than injury to a particular industry or those employed in that industry, and that is true. However, on the next page of the testimony he became very explicit and said:

> But our purpose is to make a beginning by picking out one item very carefully here, another commodity over there very carefully, which, as is said, can be made the basis of an interchange in a mutually profitable way, so that instead of anybody being injured, the American people would be helped.

The Secretary emphasized the care that would be exercised in selecting the articles on which the duty would be reduced. But why be so very careful? Obviously because it was the purpose to make mutually profitable arrangements without injuring anybody, as the Secretary said. There would have been no need for such great care if the policy under which the Trade Agreements Act was to be administered had been one of indifference to injury. On the surface at least and as driven home in statement after statement to the country, the policy, however, was not one of indifference.

In 1934 Francis B. Sayre was Assistant Secretary of State and he was to be in immediate charge of the administration of the Trade Agreements Act if it was passed. He also testified before the Committee on Ways and Means and expressed himself on the question of injury.

> We are proposing—

He said—page 342 of the 1934 hearings—

> that * * * while enhancing general prosperity is not going to be unduly injurious to any individual industry.

What did Mr. Sayre mean? Evidently he was saying that it was not the policy to seek advancement of the general prosperity at the price of undue injury to any individual industry. And what did he mean by "unduly injurious"? Evidently he did not contemplate ruining or destroying any industry. When later the escape clause was adopted the word "serious" was used to modify the word "injury" and it may be assumed that undue injury would be the same as serious injury; and when in 1951 Congress passed the escape clause amendment it adopted the term "serious injury" as it had already been used in the clause when it existed in the form of an Executive order from 1947 to 1951.

It seems clear enough that both the Secretary of State and the Assistant Secretary of State who was to administer the Trade Agreements Act after its passage, stood four square for the exercise of great caution to see to it that no serious injury was to be visited upon any American industry as a means of benefiting other industries through tariff reductions.

In making these statements before the Committee of the House in which tariff legislation must originate, these high officials were speaking to the Congress as a whole and also to the American people. Their words, therefore, carried the weight of official expression of policy and represented a pledge of honor. These assurances were the forerunners of the escape clause which was later to be devised to carry out the policy.

> I want the American people and the American public cared for—

> The State Department has that matter in very careful consideration and is trying to see whether it is possible to work out some kind of an arrangement which will not prove injurious to American producers.

Again, he said a little later in the same hearings:

> The State Department exists, in my conception, to promote American interests, not to injure them.

The Honorable Robert L. Doughton, of North Carolina, was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. He said—page 469 of the 1934 hearings:

> The impression seems to be that the President * * * would just go in and barter away, or as some others say, obliterate American industry.
> Now, do you not have confidence enough * * * in the President of the United States with the agencies at his command, to work out this legislation * * * without injury to the welfare of the American people and American industry?

These words from Mr. Doughton make it clear that he agreed with Secretary of State Hull and Assistant Secretary Sayre.

The policy of no serious injury to American industry or business was carried forward to the Senate Finance Committee. The hearings on the Trade Agreements bill were held there during April and May 1934. Secretary Hull spoke as follows—page 16 of the hearings:

> That is the point I make about it, and the last thing that the President would want to do would be to injure business.

This language is plain enough; and the assurance it contains to be straight from the shoulder and free of any intent to deceive.

A little further on the Secretary virtually threw up his hands at the very notion that any intent existed to hurt

American industry. Said he—page 23 of the hearings, Senate Finance Committee, April, May 1934:

If you want to reject this proposal, on the speculative possibility that somebody will purposely injure another, why, of course, that is not for me to comment on.

On this occasion Assistant Secretary Sayre was even more emphatic than when he appeared before the Ways and Means Committee. He said—page 72 of the Senate hearings:

I know it is not in the contemplation of the present President, nor of any member of the administration, to go out and wreck industries. I think it is perfectly chimerical to suppose that the President, or anyone with the responsibility of acting under the authority which we hope you gentlemen will give us under this bill, is going to set out to wreck industries. Not for a moment.

Here it was made clear that not only the President was of no mind to wreck any domestic industry but no member of the administration or anyone acting under the authority of the law for the enactment of which the plea was made.

Under further questioning Mr. Sayre became very explicit. He no longer spoke in the extreme terms of "wrecking industries" which, of course, he knew no President would consciously accede to. He once more explained the care that would be taken in administering the act. These were his words—page 78, Senate hearings:

It is a proceeding which will mean finding bargains which will prove to advantage to foreign trade, without undue injury to American producers.

He added that "those responsible for this program will have a real problem of finding just how trade can be increased, without undue injury to American producers." But, said Mr. Sayre, he had studied the problem enough himself to be convinced that we could secure substantial increase of foreign trade without injury.

A clearer statement of policy and purpose could hardly have been made than these words of Mr. Sayre—same page of the Senate hearings:

The object is to increase our exports without increasing those kinds of imports which will work undue injury to American domestic producers.

Mr. Speaker, these sentiments and policies were indeed later woven into an Executive order—1947—which became known as the Escape Clause. This was to be the vehicle that would give substance and body to the no-injury policy. Four years after that—1951—Congress itself adopted a modified Escape Clause to assure domestic industries that had been seriously injured by imports or threatened with such injury that they would be given relief. This legislative action was in keeping with the policy expressed by the various executive spokesmen who had appeared before Congressional committees time after time repeating the policy first enunciated by Cordell Hull and Francis Sayre, quoted herein. These two State Department officials, in turn, were echoing the policy already expressed by President Roosevelt when he sent the trade agreements message to Congress, and quoted from just now by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. Speaker, the question must inevitably arise how the great discrepancy between avowed policy and practice that has been noted could have come about. It has been said here and there that Congress itself was at fault; that it handed over its responsibility to the State Department, through the President, and was glad to be rid of its function of making the tariff, and that this delegation of power was justifiable.

I do not wish to deal in the Constitutional aspects of this question other than to say that Congress in any case cannot transfer its function to the executive and leave on the doorsteps of the White House a given responsibility simply because it itself does not wish to be bothered.

The fact in any case is that after observing the course taken by the State Department over a period of 17 years Congress did pass the escape-clause legislation. Since a similar clause was written into the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—GATT—no less than into the Executive order of 1947, already mentioned, it was clear that Congress had some reason for legislation; and, indeed, it did. It changed the escape clause in some important respects and added to it definite criteria of injury as a guide to the Tariff Commission.

This action certainly did not spell congressional indifference to what was going on under the escape clause.

Subsequently, Congress amended the clause several more times to make doubly sure that any industry threatened with or actually suffering severe injury from imports as a result of a trade agreement concession would have a remedy. This was no more than insisting that the executive branch practice what it so solemnly and extensively preached.

Yet, no visible change in the Presidential disposition of Tariff Commission recommendations under the escape clause was noticeable. It became obvious that the intent of Congress was as thoroughly disregarded by the Executive as were its own assurances to the American people. The State Department, in effect, took the bit into its own teeth and operated as if it had sole jurisdiction in the regulation of our foreign commerce. It advised the President against proclaiming Tariff Commission recommendations and the results have reflected the Department's influence. The gravitation of trade agreements administration into the hands of State Department personnel, more than anything else, no doubt accounted for the wide split between practice and avowed policy.

This ugly situation can no longer be hidden. Import competition is spreading and confronting different industries and the jobs for American workers with serious problems of survival. A solution is essential to the domestic economic expansion that nearly everyone points to as necessary if we are to find employment for the growing number of workers in this country.

At the same time, our industry and agriculture is finding it more difficult to compete in exports with other countries, and more and more of our industries are finding it necessary to establish themselves overseas, investing in plants abroad as a means of tapping lower wages, but, at the same time, leaving home communities in this country, stranded and bypassed, to suffer from unemployment and economic decay.

Even our huge mass-production industries are beginning to issue outcries against the competitive situation in imports and exports. The automobile, steel, and electrical-equipment industries are finding that even their mass-production processes and the labor-saving devices that are supposed to lower their unit costs are no longer equal to the competitive onslaught from abroad.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that something must be done, and that we cannot look to the executive branch for leading the way. The fact is that it is largely the executive practices in this field that are responsible for the present highly unsatisfactory situation. What is needed is a way of bringing that branch to do what it has been telling the Congress and the people that it was doing.

The bill explained by the gentleman from West Virginia is the least that can be offered to correct a situation that should never have been allowed to develop in the first place. I am for it; I have introduced the bill myself and plead with this Congress that it rise to its responsibility and pull away from the mistaken path beaten by the State Department in its delivery of our industries and the jobs of American workers into the hands of our foreign competitors.

I fervently hope that every Member will take another look at this situation and reach a judgment on the basis of the record. I sincerely believe that if they do so we will legislate in accordance with the new bill, and that we will do so in the present Congress. Surely the 4-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act last year cannot be allowed to have the effect of closing the doors of the present Congress to trade legislation so long as there is a need for it. This need, indeed, is pressing, and I feel sure that this House will not sidestep its responsibility.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming. I now yield to our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it has been clear for some time that there is something radically wrong with the way in which the trade agreements program has been administered. Many of us have long been aware of this; many of us have felt it; but it was not so easy to put a finger on the spot and say "this is where the trouble lies."

Mr. Speaker, I think we have now found not only a clue but the whole of the culprit. Some reviews of the history of the trade agreements program have thrown a revealing light on the subject. A number of excerpts and quotes from our Presidents and Secretaries of State on the trade agreements policy have already been given this afternoon. It is almost unbelievable that so cynical a record could have been made.

The result is an example of what can happen when a branch of the Government that is responsible for carrying out a function under the Constitution hands it to another branch for execution. We have seen here this afternoon how the actual practices under the trade agreements program could hardly be recognized as the same program as the one described in the official statements of policy that have been made by the White House, the Secretaries of State, and others. What has been said is one thing. What has been done is something very different, bearing little visible relationship to what has been professed. This, to say the least, is a sorry and humiliating state of affairs.

It has only been in the past several years of the period since 1934 that interest in import competition began to spread and to arouse alarm. Our larger industries had appeared to be immune to the undercutting power of such competition. They had the advantage, remember, of mass production, of advanced mechanization, and even automation. It made little difference, it was said, that these industries, such as steel, automobiles, and electrical equipment, paid wages anywhere from 3 to 5 or 10 times as high as those prevailing in other countries. It was claimed that our higher productivity per man would take care of that, and that we had greatly outdistanced the rest of the world with our technology and industrial know-how.

Well, that is what some of the economists said. But when the first Russian satellite was fired in October 1957 they began to feel a slight tremor of uneasiness. Perhaps we were not quite as invulnerable technologically and industrially as we had been told we were. If the Russians could challenge us in the scientific world was it not possible that other industrial countries might develop the skill and the productivity that would challenge our industrial supremacy? Might not this challenge come all the sooner because of the billions of dollars in the form of modern industrial and other machinery that we had in recent years shipped abroad? Add to this the thousands of productivity teams that were sent to visit and study our factories, and we could guess that our industrial lead was possibly as vulnerable as was our lead in the military field.

Mr. Speaker, during the many years when we were busy tearing down our tariffs we overlooked several economic forces that were making us more vulnerable to imports. We leveled our price structure and costs upward without a thought about what would happen when the chickens came home to roost. Now even the great mass production industries are finding the pressure of import competition increasing at home while facing ever greater difficulty in exporting to other countries. Smaller industries by the score are finding it even more difficult to hold their accustomed share of the domestic market. At the same time there are those who would encourage greater private foreign investments. This can only mean that the potential expanded employment which is so sorely needed at home will take place elsewhere, rather than here. Our labor force will not be absorbed as it otherwise would be. Plant expansion that would give work to thousands of our building trades workers will be dampened down. The industries that would supply the materials for the greater expansion will find their market pinched by that much. Labor, in particular, would be bypassed in favor of more employment abroad.

It is obvious that we need, not further tariff reductions that will make us more vulnerable, but a proper remedy against injury, the seeds of which were planted in previous tariff reductions. This does not call for any general tariff increase. Nobody suggests such a course. It does mean giving reality to the words of those who seemingly so faithfully promised that none of our industries would be unduly injured by the trade agreements program.

The bills that have been introduced were designed to do just that. I have joined with other House Members in introducing and sponsoring this legislation. While their effects would be to restore to Congress its authority over the tariff and trade, they would not bring the tariff writing process back to Congress. This would be left to the Tariff Commisison. No more would Congress be asked to write tariff rates than it now sets railroad and public utility rates. Rate adjustment would fall to the Tariff Commission within set limits and would be carried out under the escape clause, case by case, as the need arose.

If the past is any guide, the adjustments would not come rapidly; for even if all the Tariff Commission recommendations of the past 10 years had been promulgated, only a small part of our trade would have been affected. A study of Tariff Commission recommendations will show that in many instances the Commission has, moreover, recommended only a partial restoration of the duty to its previous level. It will also show that the Commission has failed to find serious injury in about half the cases brought before it. There need be no fear, therefore, that passage of the present bill would lead to any great increase in our tariff rates. Our trade as a whole would not be greatly restricted. In fact, if we placed import competition on a fair basis, our trade would increase in the long run. Fair competition in the home market has led to more trade than we would enjoy if cutthroat competition were the rule. There is no reason why it would not have the same effect in foreign trade.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot much longer continue to build up industry abroad, in view of the lower wages paid in other countries, while at the same time our costs continue to rise, without courting economic disaster. We have every reason to applaud greater industrial efficiency abroad as well as greater industrialization and a rising standard of living; but these goals do not call upon us to handicap ourselves. It is not necessary to expose our producers to competition that they cannot meet in order to help other countries. To assume that this is necessary represents false economics, and belies the benefits of our many laws that seek to place our own interstate commerce on a basis of fair competition. Not least of these are our minimum wage laws that are designed to protect the employers who pay fair wages against the competition of those who would depress wages, as a means of gaining a competitive advantage. We have also taken steps to protect the American wage standard by preventing an influx of workers from abroad. Our restrictive immigration laws were to a great degree designed for that very purpose.

The effect of these various laws, including our farm price support program and obligatory collective bargaining, have set us apart from the rest of the world on a plateau, competitively speaking. Already many of our exports are highly subsidized as a means of moving our goods into world markets. The whole process has caught up with itself. Now we must either lower this plateau or be prepared to defend it where it needs it, against undermining competition from the outside.

This is simple commonsense. It is the kind of sense expressed by the many official Government witnesses who during the past 25 years have come before our committees and testified that it was not the purpose of the trade agreements program to wreck or hurt our industries, but to set up a carefully worked out program that would be mutually beneficial. There is nothing mutually beneficial when our producers are sacrificed for what President Roosevelt called the will-o'-the-wisp of foreign markets.

In 1943 Secretary of State Cordell Hull in an appearance before the House Ways and Means Committee on April 12 spoke very sensibly, and sought to allay fears of what would happen if we continued indefinitely to reduce our tariffs. He said—page 17 of the hearings:

> Every precaution is provided in advance to take care of any unexpected development that might be injurious or materially hurtful to any of our industries.

Mr. Speaker, we could live with a trade program the carrying out of which actually conformed to these words of Mr. Hull. Unfortunately these words of the Secretary of State were not in fact honored.

No wonder that the American people were sold on the trade agreements program when they read of such solemn assurances that nothing would be done "that might be injurious or materially hurtful to any of our industries"; or that any unexpected developments in that direction would be taken care of in advance.

But what a difference between what Mr. Hull promised and what was later delivered when the unexpected developments did turn up and became materially hurtful to our industries.

Mr. Hull was strongly backstopped by Mr. Sayre, his assistant, as late as 1943 or after 9 years of the trade agreements program. Also testifying before the House Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Sayre on April 15, 1943, said:

> We consider that our mandate is only the granting of such concessions as can be done without injuring domestic producers.

What would anyone be led to think after listening to or reading these words of the man who had for a number of years been in direct charge of the administration of the trade agreements program in the Department of State? Were these statements meant to deceive the Congress and the people or were they sincere?

"It isn't a matter of theory," said Mr. Sayre, speaking, of course, with the full approval of Mr. Hull and expressing official policy. Not a matter of theory at all, he said, and continued:

It is a matter of practical hardheaded, brass-tack determination of "Can we increase American exports without unduly injuring American producers?"

Again, Mr. Sayre said—page 245 of the Ways and Means Committee hearings—speaking about negotiations with Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa:

We run there into various competitive goods. It is a difficult problem. We are not going to go ahead unless we find a way of doing so without injuring American producers.

Mr. Speaker, how could anyone sitting on the Ways and Means Committee at the time have doubted what the intentions of the State Department were? It seems incredible that the policy could have been anything other than what the quotations express.

During the war period there was really no occasion to test the policy so vigorously set forth by Mr. Hull and Mr. Sayre over a period of 10 years; but there can be no doubt what that policy was.

The Vice Chairman of the U.S. Tariff Commission also testified in 1943. In a statement made to the Ways and Means Committee, he supported the views expressed by the Secretary of State and others. He said—page 312 of the hearings—that while the men who work on the trade agreements program are not infallible there should be a strong presumption that they are responsible and their decisions wise. Then he added something that is of the very essence of the dispute that has raged in recent years about the escape clause:

Nevertheless, there is ample opportunity, under the program, to deal with situations not foreseen at the time of the negotiations and to remedy any mistakes that may be made.

What, Mr. Speaker, has in actual practice become of this "ample opportunity" to remedy any mistake that might be made?

What, indeed, has become of the whole policy under the guise of which the trade program was sold to the American people?

Has that policy changed? If it has not changed, then what may be said of its execution?

It is virtually impossible to run a test that will go backward beyond 1950 because the escape clause did not become very active as a remedy against injury before that time. To be sure, in 1948 Mr. William L. Clayton, a former Under Secretary of State, said of the escape clause as it existed at that time:

Part I of the Executive order provides for the so-called escape clause. That is very simple, Mr. Chairman, and I think one that is very workable and very effective for the purpose for which it was adopted.

* * * * *

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in my opinion that is a very effective means of giving relief to producers who have been injured or who are able to show that they are seriously threatened with injury.

This testimony was given before the Ways and Means Committee—pages 416–417 of the hearings—by the man who had taken the place of Mr. Sayre in immediate charge of the program.

Nineteen hundred forty-eight was too early to judge the escape clause; but the evidence is incontrovertible that it was still the policy, as expressed by the man who spoke for the State Department on the subject, that is, Mr. Clayton, not to injure American producers and to give them a remedy should injury nevertheless occur.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we come on down to more recent years we will find that the policy enunciated by President Roosevelt, Messrs. Hull, Sayre, and Clayton continued to be adhered to by the subsequent Presidents and Secretaries of State and other executive officials, from 1950 to date. However, since 1950 the escape clause was more frequently resorted to and it was with the advent of the escape clause actions that the divergence between professed policy and practice began to assert itself.

I have quoted enough and shall leave it to others to complete the record.

I am completely satisfied that there is a solid foundation in the asserted executive trade agrements policy to justify fully and to support the provisions of the proposed new legislation. If it is contrary to that policy to expose domestic producers to serious injury as a result of the trade agrements program—and who can doubt it after reading the record?—if that is the policy that has been advertised to the country as a whole, as it has, then it is surely in order to carry it out by appropriate legislation; and that is what the new bill or bills would do.

I for one find myself in thorough agreement with the proposed legislation and hope that it will be adopted.

I thank the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS] for his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MACK].

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the trade agreements program, first enacted in 1934, has now been in force almost 25 years. In 1958 our exports dropped approximately 19 percent from their high point of $19.5 billion in 1957. At the same time our imports fell much less or something over 5 percent. But for the heavy subsidy of our exports our sales abroad would unquestionably have declined even more sharply.

It is becoming clear now for all to see what many of us foresaw as the inevitable result of the trade and other policies that we have pursued since the end of World War II. These policies have made of our economy a sitting target for exporters of other countries. There was a time when our high labor and other costs were not so much of a handicap because our system of mass production resulted in lower unit costs in many industries than were enjoyed in other countries despite their much lower wage rates. During the past 10 years this advantage has been slowly but surely slipping away.

This result should have been anticipated; but we insisted on continuing the course of further tariff reductions even as we became competitively weaker in foreign trade. We helped build up the industries of other countries through distribution of tens of billions of dollars among our competitors in the four corners of the world.

Mr. Speaker, we may have done well to help the war-torn countries get back on their feet. It is heartening to know, for example, that European production is far ahead of its 1938 level.

In international affairs gratitude has been a scarce commodity. What we do have a right to expect after our far-flung foreign-aid extension is the freedom to look after ourselves and our economy in the light of new developments and vast changes, such as those that have occurred in the past decade. We have managed badly. Today it is no longer possible for us to defend ourselves against the results of the unforeseen developments cited in the escape clause in our trade agreements. We cannot take corrective action without bringing down upon us a barrage of protests from the countries that we have helped back to their feet and to the highest level of prosperity in their history. In great part this is the fault of our postwar policies. Foreign countries have learned that a sharp protest is usually sufficient to bring us to heel and to cause us to beat a retreat.

The question has been posed how it could come to pass that a policy that has been so thoroughly sold to Congress and to the people as has the assurance that the trade-agreements program would not seriously hurt any American industry could have become the hollow sham that it is today.

Mr. Speaker, it happened because the State Department in pursuit of a policy of international planning and reshaping of the world economy succeeded in binding this country in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to a course of action that contemplated the surrender of our economic sovereignty to an international trade organization. The principles underlying the agreement were directly at odds with the Presidential assurances and the statements of successive Secretaries, Under Secretaries, and Assistant Secretaries of State to congressional committees and to the country. The two courses of action, the one called for by the international executive agreement, that is, the general agreement, just mentioned, signed in Geneva in 1947, and, the other, the no-injury assurances given for home consumption, which implied continuing mastery over our household, were at cross purposes and therefore incompatible.

We could not carry out our commitments under GATT, in other words, and at the same time honor the assurances of the State Department made in such apparent sincerity to Congress and to the country.

It is obvious that between the two, the assurances to Congress and to the American people that the free-trade program would not hurt domestic industries, was the part that gave way. We could not be true to ourselves and at the same time to the foreign countries to which the State Department had made commitments that went far beyond its authority. The alternatives were mutually exclusive. In the inevitable showdown, our Government preferred to remain faithful to foreign commitments rather than to assurances to the people at home.

In the present case, that is, in the field of trade agreements and the tariff, our executive leaders, armed with the power delegated to them by Congress, felt compelled to allay the many fears that were expressed by those who were concerned with the impact of wholesale tariff reductions. Should they not succeed, the power might at the next expiration date of the grant, be withdrawn. Therefore, it was necessary to keep both Congress and the domestic industry people happy.

What happened was as much as anything the result of a double delegation. The Congress delegated to the President and he in turn put the task into the hands of the State Department. Of course, even there, the delegation went on to lower official levels.

It was at the working level, with the hands of the dedicated and philosophical free traders and world planners, that the real work was done. These enthusiasts favored international control of trade for social purposes. It was they who thought up the ill-fated International Trade Organization charter, known as the ITO, that was turned down by Congress in 1950. It was they who engineered the global trade controls vested in GATT and it was they who sought to bring this country into a world economic council which would tell us what we should produce and what we should leave to other countries. It was also they who envisioned the channeling of trade according to the directions of those who presumed to know what each country could produce most economically. In their view private enterprise could not be trusted to find the right channels. Government officials representing the different countries could do it much better, they held.

They made a shambles of the constitutional authority of Congress to regulate our foreign commerce. They made the written commitments to other countries that put Congress in the position of going along or repudiating the obligations of Uncle Sam.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the trade agreements program has been administered in a manner harmful to many domestic industries. Recent Presidents have steadfastly refused to impose an import quota on any industrial as distinguished from an agricultural or raw product. This refusal is in accordance with our commitment under GATT—the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. We have agreed to the renunciation of import quotas as a means of regulating foreign commerce, with some transitory exceptions. Rather I should say, the State Department agreed to this renunciation on the part of the United States without consulting Congress.

The fact is that no Congress sitting could give such consent because each successive Congress is a new Congress returned by the electorate and is not and cannot be bound by action of any of its predecessors. No Congress can divest itself of the duty to carry out its constitutional obligations; and the regulation of foreign commerce and fixing the tariff are such obligations.

Mr. Speaker, I come from a State in which the plywood and fishing industries are important employers and have witnessed the damage that can be done by low-cost imports.

An import quota, in the judgment of the policymakers of the hardwood plywood industry, is the only suitable method of remedying the injury inflicted by imports. Since most of the imports come from Japan a tariff of exorbitant height would be necessary to put on the brakes. Such a high tariff would have the effect of excluding many other countries from our market entirely.

This puts the President in this position: he has said that no industry is to be jeopardized by imports under the trade agreements program. Therefore he must desire to respond to the needs of the plywood industry. Yet he cannot act to do so because the State Department has deprived him of the only suitable instrument. He could not impose an import quota on plywood without violating GATT. The State Department has shot his best weapon out of his hands.

The State and Commerce Departments have accepted statements by Japan that she would limit her plywood exports to the United States voluntarily as a full solution of the plywood import problem. This is no solution for Japan can change her voluntarially imposed quotas at any time. This so-called solution through voluntary quotas imposed by exporting nations on themselves is no solution at all, since it reposes control of imports in the hands of the exporter nation and not of the importing nation, where the injury to domestic industry occurs.

It cannot be said that he has not recognized the injury caused by imports since he could not otherwise countenance the activities of the State and Commerce Departments in negotiating clandestinely behind the scenes to limit Japanese exports to this country. In fact, he set aside a finding of injury in the velveteen case by the Tariff Commission on the grounds that the so-called voluntary export quota self-imposed by Japan made action unnecessary.

The upshot is that our foreign trade policy is in a highly contradictory posture and that our right as a country to adjust to changing international economic developments has been consigned to the dead letter office. We have become paralyzed and helpless as a result of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

There is only one proper way out of this contradictory predicament and this lies in carrying out in fact the principle upon which the trade agreements program has been continuously recommended to the Congress and the country—the providing of relief to industries whose employment and prosperity have been injured by heavy imports of competitive products from low-wage nations. This will dissolve the contradiction and the duplicity in which the President and the State Department now stand, to their great discredit.

Mr. Speaker, the bill that has been introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY], myself, and others will go a long way toward setting the situation right.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have often wondered on what grounds it could be said that the surest way to promote peace lay in expanding trade. Yet that was and is one of the principal justifications advanced in support of the trade agreements program. It has been my impression that some of the bloodiest wars in history were fought for commercial reasons. Many competent observers regarded World War I as the culmination of commercial rivalry between Britain and Germany.

It has been an odd development to find the trade agreements program advocated now as a weapon to be used against Russia. From being a sure instrument for the establishment of universal peace we now behold the 25-year-old program advertised as a suitable or even indispensable weapon of the cold war. In the last extension of the program in 1958 its supporters said we must have more of GATT as a means of engaging in economic warfare with Russia.

GATT must be a versatile instrument. It is said to serve as a means of promoting peace, and yet by others it is said to serve just as well as a weapon of economic warfare.

Mr. Speaker, I have not made a practice of quoting former President Truman to establish or bolster a point. In this instance, however, the former President speaks outside the field of politics and I believe that what he said on the question of trade and peace is worthy of attention. In an article that appeared in a local newspaper on February 18, Mr. Truman said that Mikoyan had told the Soviet Party Congress that peace is promoted by trade and that nations that trade with each other live peacefully side by side.

If Mikoyan had come here—

not with blandishments of trade, but with a program of peace, his chances of success would have been greatly enhanced.

But Mikoyan has the mistaken belief, as do the Kremlin leaders and, I suspect, some businessmen here, that trade comes first and is a cure-all for all international differences. They believe that if you have trade, peace automatically follows.

Two world wars—

have proved that trade alone is not the road to peace.

I think it would be a good idea for Mr. Truman to go before the Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee and tell them what he has said in his article. Evidently the former President does not share the sublime faith of Cordell Hull in the healing powers of world trade.

The fact is that a sharp distinction should be drawn when we talk of trade and peace, between trade that is competitive and trade that is complementary. The latter, that is, complementary trade does indeed usually but not always contribute to peace. The United States and Brazil have such a relationship. Brazilian coffee stirs up no resentment here even though it is one of our No. 1 imports. It does not threaten any coffee industry in this country because we have none. Brazil likes us as a customer. We in turn ship products to Brazil that Brazil needs but does not manufacture or has not previously manufactured. So, Brazil is our customer for other products and generally our relations are very amicable.

This is as it should be and would be expected to be. Brazil sided with us in two world wars. This was natural, since we had no commercial crosscurrents.

Our relations with Argentina have not been so smooth. Our trade is not so complementary. Argentina has things to ship us that we also produce, such as meat products, corn, and wool. In that case trade means rivalry, and rivalry can lead to ill feeling.

A good part of our imports encounter little or no competition in this country. Generally these imports are free of duty. Our free-list imports account for 50 percent of our total imports. The imports that cause trouble are those that compete with products that we make very well ourselves and for which we can generally supply the market ourselves or a large share of it.

The same situation obtains in our exports. When we seek to sell automobiles in England or France or Italy, we immediately encounter almost insuperable obstacles. Why? Because those countries also have automobile industries and fear the ruin that our competition might visit upon them.

Sometimes the keenest rivalry develops in competition for third markets. The British, for example, compete with the Germans and the Japanese and others in Latin America and elsewhere. The Japanese and the Europeans compete for our own market. In this process there is no magnetism that draws the competing countries together. The effect is quite the opposite.

I am glad to register satisfaction that Mr. Truman has noted the fallacy that trade as such promotes peace. I would be happier if this fallacy could be dispelled more widely and if in the shaping of our foreign-trade policy the realities of trade, including the friction caused by trade rivalry were pondered and given proper weight. The notion that free trade would lead to peace is the worst kind of propaganda and we do ourselves no credit if we exhaust ourselves chasing what former President Roosevelt called the will-o'-the-wisp of foreign markets.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I now recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I shall support vigorously any legislation designed to protect American jobs from excessive imports. I associate myself with the gentlemen who speak in favor of the bill to amend section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930. Let me be frank to add, however, that this measure will not alone provide the answer to all the economic problems attributable to unrealistic foreign trade policies.

In the 10 years that I have been active in the crusade to protect our Nation's domestic fuel producers and transporters from the ravages of residual oil imports, I have time and again been forced to the conclusion that a definite quota—established by law—is the only foolproof answer. I solicit the cooperation of my colleagues in bringing about the enactment of such legislation in this session.

Whether or not you have oil or coal production in your district, you cannot help but be sympathetic with the thousands upon thousands of your fellow Americans who are not working today because the product of their labor is not wanted in this country. It has been displaced by a foreign commodity. Many millions of tons of coal that once came from the mines of Pennsylvania and other Appalachian States are no longer marketable along our Atlantic seaboard because residual oil produced in foreign countries is being shipped in and unloaded at whatever price is necessary to undersell coal.

This is the simple reason for much of the unemployment that prevails in central and western Pennsylvania. We need not offer any involved theories to explain the situation. Anyone who lives along the Pennsylvania Railroad line between Pittsburgh and eastern points can see for himself what has happened. The trainloads of coal that should be going to seaboard utilities and industrial plants are just not moving. In the absence of this coal traffic, there had to be layoffs for trainmen and maintenance crews.

Back where the coal would be produced are idle men trying to understand the logic of government policies that deprive Americans of the opportunity to earn a living. The men who sell timber and other supplies to coal mines are in the same boat astride economic reefs. So are the various businessmen who normally sell to miners, railroaders, and their families.

You have compassion for these people but you hear the internationalists' chorus that becomes more vocal each time we get close to amending our foreign trade laws, so you hesitate and—it has been our unfortunate experience in past years—you decide to string along with the status quo in hopes that some other force or forces will provide the economic stimulus to get our people back to work. Mining and railroading industries have been the guinea pigs in these international experiments for entirely too long. I appeal to my colleagues to move now—not next year or when the Trade Agreements Act expires—to provide some relief from the illicit foreign competition that we have been forced to endure for almost since the end of World War II.

I remind you also that the very lives of the citizenry of our country are threatened when America looks to foreign nations instead of to its own manpower and ingenuity to provide the essential ingredients of a strong defensive structure. I have many times warned that the oil supply lines from Venezuela and the Dutch West Indies could be severed in an instant if the seething international situation should explode. Shipments from the Middle East could, of course, be halted with even greater facility and expediency.

Now I should like to discuss a very grave matter that would place our country in still greater jeopardy. You may already have heard that a tanker flying a foreign flag was scheduled to bring into this country a cargo of residual oil from the fields of Russian-controlled Rumania. I was advised this morning that the ship has arrived and is now anchored at Gravesend Bay and that it is expected to discharge its cargo at Edgewater, N.J. The capacity of that ship is 10,000 barrels. Ten thousand barrels, Mr. Speaker. Ten thousand barrels of Communist produced oil to displace coal or oil that would otherwise come from American mines or refineries. Ten thousand barrels of reliance upon the strategy of the Kremlin rather than on the capacity of American industry.

Think of it, Mr. Speaker. Through the Black Sea, the Bosporus, and then the long haul through the Mediterranean and, finally, through the Strait of Gibraltar and across the Atlantic. Yet that cargo can be unloaded at a price with which the coal produced only a short distance away cannot compete. Why, my distinguished friends, I am quite confident that the Soviet masters would be very happy to subsidize—if necessary—tanker after tanker if we in this country would be so blind as to permit our mines and oil drilling and producing activities to remain idle in this critical hour. Who would be willing to depend upon the mills of the Donets Basin for the steel used in our missile and airplane programs? In actuality, the ability of the United States to obtain all the steel needed in our defense pattern would be shifted right over to those Rumanian oil wells if enough coal is displaced in this country. We close our mines and they cannot be opened at a moment's notice. It may take months or even years and sometimes drainage and flooding render them useless for evermore. I remind you that just 10 of those tankers could close down a mine producing over 40,000 tons of coal annually. For those who may not remember, mines of that size and every size were vitally needed in World War II. Coal goes into sharply accelerated demand in every emergency. I beg you to join in preventing the further deterioration of this essential industry.

We must support the legislation under discussion at this time. We must also—for the sake of this Nation's economy and security—pass a quota limitation on residual oil imports.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the comments on this matter of the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from West Virginia for his dedicated interest in the problem of reciprocal trade. I can see that he understands fully the departure of the present practice of reciprocal trade from the original theory of reciprocity in order to get strategic materials and to furnish other countries with other manufactured goods which those countries could not produce.

The reciprocal trade circle, instead of being a wholly beneficial circle, is what we want to call now a vicious circle, and the question now is which of the American industries is next expendable.

Reciprocal trade, as now practiced, is responsible for a large part of our unemployment today.

The small foreign car is finding a ready market here in this country—a small foreign car made by labor paid far less than the average automobile worker's pay in this country.

We who have lived in the textile area know of the heavy impact of foreign trade on the lives of these people. To the textile people whose living depends upon being able to work for a living wage, the situation is terrifically serious.

We find that the Elgin National Watch Co. plans to manufacture and assemble watches in Switzerland. Where does that put the American seeking employment in the watch industry?

The Navy recently made a heavy purchase of Japanese steel. What responsibility do we have to the steelworkers of America?

We are informed that 20 percent of the total tan calfskins used in the United States in 1958 were imported. What responsibility do we have to the cattlemen, or to the workers on leather goods?

I recognize the fact that the total U.S. exports are very high. I recognize the necessity of exports. No one will deny that we do not need trade. And yet, I do not believe anyone could conscientiously say that we do not have the responsibility first to the citizens of this country, and to their sources of employment. Perhaps it is time to shift from foreign aid to U.S. aid, and perhaps it is time to take a second look.

While we are so-called guaranteeing the trade balance in other countries, Americans are suffering.

To show you something about the pace from pay of Japanese industrial workers, whose imports are undermining our markets, I quote from the Wall Street Journal, as attached to the Japanese Report, volume V, No. 3, February 1, 1959:

> This busy gentleman illustrates some striking new facts about industrial Japan. First, the Nipponese factory hand today is financially a lot better off than he is commonly pictured abroad, with more leisure to indulge his traditional artistic bent, and second, Japan's automobile industry, which barely existed before the war, now is sprinting ahead to a position of importance—and is invading the U.S market in the process. * * *
> Automobiles, however, are on a lengthening list of export products that are facing rising labor costs—a trend that is weakening one of Japan's traditional advantages in world markets.
> One of the peculiarities of the Japanese wage system is that very little merit is involved in pay raises. If one asks Mr. Yamamoto how much a skilled toolmaker earns as compared with say, a man who just tightens bolts all day the personnel man will counter with another question: "How old are they?"
> If both have been with the company the same time, chances are their wages aren't more than 10 percent to 15 percent apart—no matter what duties they have, unless they're foremen or managers. "We don't hire skilled workers," says Mr. Yamamoto. "We train them ourselves from youth."
> Pay increases are given automatically every year. Thus, the average manufacturing worker in a big plant who starts at $30 or so per month is almost sure to be making around $100 after 12 years' service, $170 10 years later, and perhaps $220 after 30 years' service. Through this entire period he may have been doing exactly the same job. Nowadays the implications of this system—a constantly rising wage bill for the same work—are beginning to worry Japanese exporters who fear they'll soon be priced out of overseas markets.

I hope that the gentleman's remarks will bear fruit, and arouse the corrective activity which this legislation and its policy deserves.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WHITENER].

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia and those who have so eloquently again pleaded the cause of the working people of this country whose jobs have been so jeopardized by an unrealistic program of so-called reciprocal trade.

Mr. Speaker, I come from a district in North Carolina that has come in recent years to suffer greatly from import competition. The principal product is, of course, textiles. So serious has this situation become, not only in my district and in my State but throughout the South and New England, that during the recent recess of Congress a subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the other body held hearings on the problems of the textile industry.

Among the conclusions reached by that body of outstanding Members of the U.S. Senate was one that called for import quotas as a means of regulating the harmful import competition and keeping it within bounds. I heartily agree that steps must be taken immediately to deal effectively with this menace from the low-wage countries of the Far East, principally Japan and Hong Kong. Otherwise the domestic textile industry will be severely crippled if not destroyed.

Basically, I think the trouble lies in extremely low wages paid in many of the textile-producing countries, together with the modern machinery installed so extensively in those countries in recent years. No one can question that this is true. There is no longer any question about the ability of the Far Eastern producers to take away our market both at home and abroad, the only limitation being their present and ever-increasing capacity to produce. Japan today leads the world in textile exports. India is second. England and the United States have lost their leadership in this field.

This is not a matter about which we can afford to be complacent. I am well aware, as are all of our colleagues, of our international relations and of the Russian menace. Nor is it a secret that Japan needs and must have an opportunity to export if it is to live. We are confronted with many difficulties in reaching a solution to this problem of import competition. Foreign countries today receive our raw cotton at prices from 25 to 30 percent below those paid by the textile manufacturers of North Carolina, New England, and other parts of this land of ours. This is an anomalous situation, but it is not the only aspect of our policy that is odd and even bizarre.

In selling raw cotton abroad at world prices we are now competing with the very countries where we stimulated cotton production since the war. During this postwar period we have also stimulated the development of textile industries in a number of so-called underdeveloped countries. They are therefore trending toward self-sufficiency and even toward exportation in many cases. In either case our own exports decline. In the meanwhile, imports pour into this country. All these contradictory actions place us in the position of fighting and frustrating with one hand what we do with the other.

And what has been our defense? In 1955 we reduced the duty on textiles at the Geneva Conference, right in the face of what was already obvious, namely, the coming flood of imports. What happened? The story is too well known to need repeating. Suffice it to say that imports rose so rapidly that they posed an actual threat of destruction to our own industry.

What was the response of the executive departments who have replaced Congress in the regulation of our foreign trade?

Instead of invoking the laws applicable to situations of this kind, the executive branch did all within its power to prevent their invocation. The last thing it wanted was a restoration of the constitutional power of Congress. Instead, the executive moved carefully away from the law and had recourse to an arrangement worked out in secret behind the scenes in the State and Commerce Departments. This resulted in a so-called voluntary export quota imposed by Japan herself. Aside from leaving Hong Kong outside of the arrangement, the agreement which we all know was not an agreement, provided no means of enforcement. It established no rights for American manufacturers. There were no records of any hearings or conferences or any published provisions of any agreement that they might be invoked. It left the industry as a pawn at the mercy of the whims of the two executive departments.

Even now, though exports from Hong Kong have zoomed skyward, that country has refused to listen to any restrictions on those exports. Whether the goods come from Japan or Red China or originate in Hong Kong is beside the point. It is apparent that the Japanese restrictions on imports to this country are not effective in holding down the yardage to the volume agreed to in the arrangement. Also, Japan at this very hour is clamoring for a higher volume and should her desires not prevail, she may upset the whole arrangement without violating any legal commitment whatever and, of course, Hong Kong has expressed displeasure over what she calls our effort to meddle in her export trade.

The fact is that in sidestepping the laws on the subject the executive departments have led us into a no man's land where no true bearing exists and where uncertainty must persist as long as the voluntary arrangement lasts. It is time that some regularity be introduced into this field where highly irregular action has been taken. I am sure that nothing but chaos will result unless we get back to operation according to law.

Mr. Speaker, I have followed the course of our trade agreements legislation for several years now and I am convinced that we must have something that is more workable than anything that is now on the scene if our industries are to have a fair chance to operate at a reasonable profit and contribute their proper share to the upkeep and expansion of our economy.

It is completely absurd to continue to look to our much vaunted superior industrial know-how to keep us going in a world in which the bases of international trade competition have changed profoundly in recent years. How long, Mr. Speaker, does it take and how much damage must be done before we look the changed facts in the face?

In recent months some very significant expressions have come from some of our industrial leaders. These should be eye openers, not simply because the men expressing themselves are industrial leaders, but because they are leaders in our mass-production industries. I refer to the huge steel and automobile industries. They had long been accustomed to ride on the profitable wave of exports and were above the storm of troublous import competition. For years, nay, for decades, they seemed to be immune to the fears that assailed lesser industries. They were the very embodiment of American industrial efficiency and the pride of our technological leadership.

Only last autumn Mr. Roger Blough, chairman of United States Steel Corp., and not much later Mr. Ernest R. Breech, chairman of the Ford Motor Co., confessed to the country that things were no longer what they used to be. We were losing our export markets, they both said, and were even being assailed in our home market by imports. The U.S. economy, they said, was pricing itself out of the world market and laying itself open to competitive onslaught from abroad. The trouble, they said, lay in the high production costs prevailing in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is something that all of us have known; but the fact has consistently been denied by our learned economists who have contended, without rhyme or reason, that our higher productivity made up for our greater production costs. That this was not true, except in a few mass-production industries, was well known to scores of smaller industries or large though less integrated industries, such as the textile industry, for years.

That the standouts, such as the steel, automobile, and electrical equipment industries, should now acknowledge this fact is the result of postwar developments. This country itself has shipped to other industrial and nonindustrial countries modern machinery and equipment to the extent of billions of dollars, much of it under our foreign-aid program. That there exists much technical competence and skill in other countries can no longer be doubted. Not only does that skill exist but it was given a great deal of guidance and thrust through the study of thousands of productivity teams sent to this country.

Mr. Speaker, what should we have expected? Many of us were sure that what has happened would happen; and we were concerned about it. We tried, legislatively, to do something about it.

The evidence of competitive discomfiture from which the great domestic steel industry is now suffering is a story of long standing with smaller industries. When the giants begin to groan under the strain it should not require much imagination to appreciate what must be the lot of many smaller industries.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, feel very strongly that the 85th Congress, of which I had the honor of being a Member, did not face up to the import problem, in simply extending the trade agreements program another 4 years. It left matters very nearly in the status quo; and that is not satisfactory—indeed, far from satisfactory. It would virtually deny to our industries a remedy against the errors and miscalculations made by our Government in negotiating tariff reductions. Yet, nothing is clearer than the inability to foresee the effects of tariff reductions.

This fact was not only not denied by executive officials who testified on the trade agreements program on various occasions when the trade agreements act was up for renewal, but was openly admitted and met. Mr. William L. Clayton, who has already been quoted this afternoon and who was one of the leading State Department promoters of freer trade, himself a great cotton export merchant, addressed himself to this question before the Senate Finance Committee. The chairman of the committee posed the question of possible unwise trade agreements that might be made. Let me quote. This is very enlightening—page 40 of the 1948 hearings, Senate Finance Committee:

The CHAIRMAN. I devoutly hope you have made wise trade agreements. I devoutly hope that, but I do not think you can demonstrate that.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think we have.

The CHAIRMAN. Until we get to the time that we really commence to balance supply with demand, not only here but elsewhere.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think we have made wise trades, and I think we must not overlook the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. If you have not, if you have sacrificed the proper safeguarding of domestic industry, when this thing really gets to working, when the world commences to bring its supply into balance with demand, you will have subjected this country to the greatest cataclysm that ever befell it.

Mr. CLAYTON. On that I respectfully disagree.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, that certainly will happen if you have made bad judgment, will it not?

Mr. CLAYTON. No. I think that movement into action promptly under the escape clause to correct any bad judgment that has been made and prompt action will be taken.

According to Mr. Clayton the remedy for any bad judgment exercised in the making of a trade agreement lay in the escape clause.

Former Chairman of the Tariff Commission, Mr. Oscar B. Ryder, also testified at that hearing. This is what he said:

Mr. RYDER. I had something to do with the drafting of the escape clause as it was originally drafted, and put into the Mexican agreement. It was drafted because of the very obvious difficulty of foreseeing what would be the situation at the end of the war. * * *

Manifestly, what looked safe then now might in conditions after the war be entirely unsafe. So in solving that problem, we hit upon, at my suggestion, the present escape clause which is written into the Mexican agreement (p. 133, 1948 hearings, Senate Finance Committee).

Admissions of fallibility in making tariff reductions were freely made by other official witnesses who discussed the escape clause. Almost without exception these witnesses pointed to the escape clause as the remedy or safety valve.

Yet, although Congress has legislated several times to show its intent and to avoid further misinterpretations, such legislation has been almost completely ignored by the White House.

I agree with what has been said here this afternoon. The 1958 extension bill did very little to bring us any nearer to what has been the uniformly declared policy under the Trade Agreements Act: namely, avoidance of serious injury to domestic producers or industries.

One reason, in my judgment, why more was not done in 1958 lay in the provision of the amendments offered on the floor to bring Tariff Commission decisions before Congress for final disposition. This may have been regarded as saddling Congress with too much technical detail.

The present bill would not do this. It would, on the contrary, implement the declared policy of successive administrations of both parties to the effect that there is a sure remedy against injury resulting from error or unforeseen development. In bringing this policy into actual practice there can be no question of foreign objection since this very policy is recognized in the trade agreements themselves.

Therefore, so long as a Tariff Commission recommendation goes no further than rescinding a tariff cut, there can be no legitimate objection from abroad, except to impugn the Commission's proceedings; and, of course, the courts are open to such a challenge.

I am of the firm opinion that we in Congress owe it to the millions of people in this country who have a vital stake in the fairness of import competition and prevention of serious injury, to pass legislation that will accomplish these objectives and to abandon the unsatisfactory policy that has characterized the clear record of the executive branch in this field.

Mr. Speaker, this question is one which is upon the hearts and minds of management and labor alike. It is one which should be upon the minds and hearts of every Member of this great body which has the responsibility for legislating for the future of this Nation.

Just a few days ago, I, by chance, had an opportunity to run into an executive in the import department of one of the foreign automobile manufacturers. We had a rather interesting conversation. I could not, during the conversation, avoid remembering some of the arguments we had here in this House just a few months ago when the so-called Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was extended. As I talked to this young man, and he was a very brilliant young gentleman, he pointed out to me how many automobiles they were sending into this country each year, and he said very proudly:

Of course, that is my job. We have not scratched the surface.

He said:

You know we like to do business in your country. We like to export our automobiles into the United States because we are not concerned or bothered by a lot of redtape and difficulties. We can do it so much easier than we can even in countries which do not produce automobiles to any extent.

So, Mr. Speaker, I today again with my colleagues would like to urge that not only the Members of this body, but that the people in the business life of this country of ours—those who may consider that they have individual interests which are in conflict with the great textile industry and with the jobs of the 227,000 textile employees in North Carolina—be a little more considerate of the plight of others as they deal with this problem. Let us hope that they will join together, as we are doing here today, in an earnest effort and fervent desire to take that course of action which will best promote the economy of this country and the welfare of every living American.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, on other occasions I have risen to call to the attention of this House the plight of the hardwood plywood industry which has been under attack of the foreign producers of low priced hardwood plywood for a number of years. My district contained a number of hardwood plywood and hardwood veneer plants. These plants have been forced to close or operate on a restricted basis receiving extremely low prices for their plywood due to imports of unfairly low priced hardwood plywood from foreign countries.

In 1955 the American hardwood plywood industry appealed to the Tariff Commission for relief from the low priced plywood imports. The Tariff Commission found that injury had not existed for a sufficient length of time to determine a trend. Relief was, therefore, denied.

The American hardwood plywood industry has again appealed to the Tariff Commission for relief and a hearing will be held on April 14, 1959. I sincerely hope that the Commission will give this case the most careful consideration, keeping in mind that it is the intent of this Congress that domestic industry shall receive relief from imports causing or threatening to cause injury.

In order to meet the standard of living which we have created through our minimum wage and hour law and our labor management law, it is essential that our domestic industry be permitted to increase its volume of production in order to decrease the unit cost of the product. To obtain this needed volume, our industry must be guaranteed the right to participate in the increased volume which results from our increase in population and individual income. If a domestic industry is foreclosed by imports from participating in the increase in consumption, it will be destroyed eventually by imports. The exclusion of domestic industry from increased consumption is injurious and this fact must be recognized.

The Tariff Commission decision in the hardwood plywood case was handed down in June 1955. A review of what has happened since the decision is illustrative of the need for reversal of our policy of favoring imports over domestic products. Statistics obtained from the Department of Commerce disclose the following:

Hardwood plywood imports in 1958 will reach an alltime high. In the period January–November, plywood imports amounted to 811 million square feet, 30 million square feet in excess of the same period 1957. It is estimated that imports of 1958 will approximate 870 million square feet.

In 1954, the year preceding the Tariff Commission decision, hardwood plywood imports were 426 million square feet. This represented 36.1 percent of total U.S. shipments. In 1957 hardwood plywood imports were 842 million square feet, representing 52 percent of U.S. shipments. In the first three quarters of 1958, domestic shipments of hardwood plywood amounted to 564 million square feet and imports 637 million square feet, representing 53 percent of the total U.S. market consumption since 1955.

Highly industrial Japan is the principal shipper of low-priced plywood to the United States. In 1951, Japan shipped 13 million square feet to the United States; in 1957, 679.8 million square feet, an increase of 5,300 percent. In 1958, plywood imports from Japan will approximate 665 million square feet, an increase since the Tariff Commission decision of 55 percent.

During this period of tremendous increases in imports our domestic industry has showed a steady decline in shipments, sales, profits, and last but not least, the number of employees.

An industry survey shows that since 1955 shipments are down 17 percent; profit has declined 7.3 percent and profit before tax 5.6 percent. The profit before taxes for the industry was approximately 1 percent on sales in the first half of 1958. Many companies were in the red. This is the direct result of hardwood plywood imports.

Our domestic producers of hardwood plywood have been buffeted on all sides. The low-priced imports have prevented our producers from passing on the increases in labor, material, and freight costs through price increases. The large quantities shipped in by the foreign producers have excluded the domestic producers from participation in the increased consumption and regaining increased costs through increased volume.

My district has been seriously injured by the import of low-priced plywood. It is my opinion that it is high time for the administrative agencies to enforce the intention of Congress as expressed in the laws and stop the increasing injury to our domestic economy from imports. I am sure my colleagues are aware of the increase in unemployment to 4,700,000 at a time when we are supposedly coming out of a recession. I know of one industry which can and will increase employment if imports are restricted to a reasonable percent of our market. I refer, of course, to the hardwood plywood industry. I am sure many other industries could return some of their people to the payroll and maybe add a few.

This morning's papers carry the story that the AFL–CIO leaders now propose a 35-hour workweek, a 7-hour day. The reason is the need for the employment of more persons. A shorter week will increase the costs of our products and make our industries more vulnerable to imports from countries having low wages and longer work hours. The administration should revise its approach to the problem of foreign trade and devote its efforts within the framework of our laws to obtain substantially full employment for our country rather than full employment for foreign countries.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. In the tragic passing of our distinguished and wonderful patriot and colleague, Daniel A. Reed, of New York, we have lost one of the greatest defenders of our industry, both management and labor; one of the greatest fighters for the protection of the textile industry and other industries that we have ever had in the United States. A man of the greatest integrity, we shall miss him beyond my power to express.

I commend the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] for his valiant fight month after month and year after year for protection of our industries. I would like to protest most vehemently the way our textile industry has been thrown away in this country without any excuse. It has caused great hardships and want. It does not apply to any one particular party. Both parties have been to blame in not helping us. For years I have warned and warned on the floor of this House that the textile industry was disappearing. For years I have warned how Japan, for instance, has been taking our textile markets. I will be glad to help in any way I can to restore it to the United States. I want to protect other industries in our country also.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY], for sharing with me some of his time today in bringing the complete picture before the House concerning the trade agreements program of this country. There are several aspects of it which have been presented very firmly and very sincerely today, all of which I want to concur in, and to congratulate my colleagues who have gone before me this afternoon for the very complete presentation that has been made.

However, there are other aspects of this particular program that I would like to speak to you concerning. One in particular.

Mr. Speaker, I, for one, have been very much interested in the history of the trade agreements program and also in the escape clause. What has been said on the floor this afternoon has, I am sure, been an eye opener to those who were not aware of this history. I am also sure that it will come as a surprise to many good people on the outside who had no idea of the strong commitment made by the executive branch to the Congress that the trade agreements program would be so carried out that it would not seriously hurt any of our industries or producers.

The wide discrepancy that has been uncovered between assurance and performance will also go far toward explaining the bitterness of these who have in good faith applied to the Tariff Commission for relief only to find that a likely Presidential veto awaited them if the Commission found serious injury. As someone has already pointed out, the President has set aside seven unanimous Commission decisions, and of a total of some thirty recommendations, including the seven just mentioned, the President has acted affirmatively in only eleven cases. This means a fatality of about two to one. When the Tariff Commission's own rejections are taken into account, running a little over 50 percent, it is obvious that the chances of obtaining a remedy under the escape clause are something less than one in four.

Now I ask you to listen to a few more words from the mouths of those who went before congressional committees as official spokesmen of the State Department in support of the trade agreements program.

Read against the record of escape clause action just cited, these words from Mr. William Clayton, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, to the Senate Finance Committee in 1948, are in sharp contrast:

> We also have the escape clause which permits the withdrawal of any concession which endangers a domestic industry. * * * Designed to be operated by the Tariff Commission reporting directly to the President, it offers a prompt and sure remedy always available when needed.

I join with other Members who have spoken, in calling attention to the flat-footedness of the assurances given to Congress, and therefore to the American people. Little doubt could be left in the minds of the committee members. The preceding statement was made to the Senate Finance Committee, as already said; but that was not the end of it. Committee members were skeptical and put many questions. The chairman asked whether the President, Mr. Truman, and the State Department had not given affirmative assurances in hearings that no American industry would be injured. Mr. Clayton said:

> That is right, and we put in the escape clause to make sure that was carried out.

Asked by the chairman why—the State Department—after promising that no industry would be injured, they speculated with this promise, Mr. Clayton replied very firmly:

> We don't speculate, Mr. Chairman. We put in an absolute condition which will guarantee the performance of that promise, which is the escape clause.

An absolute guarantee, my colleagues, that every industry would be given the protection of this particular clause in the law.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I yield to my colleague from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like for the record to show that the State Department did not put the escape clause in; it was put into the extension of the Trade Agreements Act on the floor of the House and Senate in 1951.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman for setting the record straight. I am only quoting from the testimony which was given in 1948 with respect to this particular clause.

Mr. BAILEY. At that time they had a so-called escape clause, but it did not set up any procedure whereby an industry could apply to the Tariff Commission for a hearing.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman very much.

After further prodding on the question, Mr. Clayton once more answered:

> The point is, Senator, and I go back to it, he emphasized, showing clearly that his words were not lightly spoken, and I contend that I am right, that under this Executive order of February 25, 1947 (the escape clause), relief has to be given and will be given to an American producer who makes out a good case.

One would think that this would have exhausted the subject. Yet it was further pursued. There were some lingering doubts in the minds of committee members. Replying to a question inquiring how the point—peril point—could be found, that is, the point below which a tariff could not be cut without causing injury, Mr. Clayton said simply:

> We don't attempt to find it with absolute certainty, because we know we can't.

What he added was very significant and showed the basic approach to the problem. He said:

> But what we do say is that if there are those cases where we take some calculated risk in order to achieve an overall desideratum, and we find we are wrong, we have a protection, here in the escape clause, so the mistake, if it occurs, can be corrected.

In other words, Mr. Clayton admitted both the possibility of mistakes in reducing duties and also in taking "calculated risks" but was quick to point to the remedy by which any such errors could be corrected. If the mistake occurs it can be corrected, he said. Also he said "relief has to be given and will be given to an American producer who makes out a good case."

What is a good case? Is it not a good case if six members of the Tariff Commission unanimously find serious injury after full hearings of all interested parties who wish to testify? Why then has the President set aside seven such unanimous recommendations of the Commission?

Quite obviously there is something seriously wrong. Was Mr. Clayton so contemptuous of a committee of the Senate that he willfully undertook to mislead it? Quite surely not. Then where does the failure to square performance with promises actually lie?

Through what opening did it creep?

Mr. Dulles later—1955—drew a distinction between an industry as a whole and a segment of an industry. He thought injury to an industry as a whole could not be countenanced, but perhaps injury to only part of an industry could be justified. In the same year Congress plugged that concept very effectively by adopting an amendment making it clear that the escape clause did extend to segments of an industry.

Mr. Dulles confirmed what has been said on the floor of this House this afternoon, namely, that the right to withdraw a concession is recognized by all parties to the trade agreements. Said he—1955 hearings before Senate Finance Committee, page 2062:

> In other words, we have gotten the agreement of all countries to the effect that when we give them a tariff concession we can always get out of it through the operation of the escape clause. We have made the escape clause a multilateral undertaking instead of just a unilateral undertaking.

This makes it clear that there is no question about withdrawing a concession, that is, restoring a duty to its original level, if serious injury takes place. The only remaining question would be a question of fact, of whether such injury was actually occurring or threatening.

The finding on this question of fact has been given to the Tariff Commission.

From the record as I read it, and from the numerous excerpts from official statements that have been given to us this afternoon, I have no remaining doubt that a finding of serious injury by the Tariff Commission should automatically open the door to a remedy. I do not see how any other conclusion could be drawn from the record.

I am therefore in full accord with legislation that would produce this effect. I think it is wholly justified and should be passed. No other country could complain with any shadow of right unless it alleged faulty procedure or faulty findings by the Commission.

I think it is an open-and-shut case, that a finding of serious injury by the Commission should unquestionably assure a remedy, as has been so numerously promised, so long as the remedy merely reestablished the status quo. This is what the identical bills provide. I strongly favor enactment. To me it seems a matter of simple justice and putting executive practice on the same track as the policy affirmations that have been made to Congress.

The country will not much longer be blinded to the facts. The President and the State Department have been saying one thing and doing something quite different over the years. This is not a partisan matter. The public has been misled. It is high time that this unwholesome situation be set right. I heartily join with those whose purpose it is to do so.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank my colleague from West Virginia for his participation in this program.

I now yield to my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. HECHLER].

Mr. HECHLER. I desire to commend my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. MOORE] for his able and thorough presentation just concluded. And I desire to compliment the distinguished dean of the West Virginia delegation [Mr. BAILEY], for his long and tireless efforts on behalf of the people of West Virginia and the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, West Virginians are without doubt the principal victims of Government trade policies that subordinate economic and security considerations to international diplomacy and protocol. Unless you have lived in the middle of the distress created by unfair competition, you cannot visualize the destructive capacity of some of the phases of the present trade agreements program.

Our struggle against the inequities that permit foreign oil to submerge entire communities in economic disaster is now in its 10th year. In fact, our working people felt the impact of alien residual oil from the end of World War II. Over the years I have followed closely the efforts of West Virginia's congressional delegations and their colleagues from other coal-producing States. I recognize that the situation has been forcefully explained from time to time on the floors of the House and Senate, yet today's membership in Congress includes a great many gentlemen whose service began only last month and who would not be expected to understand fully the problems created by excessive imports of residual oil. For their benefit I shall review briefly what has been happening in east-coast fuel markets over the past decade.

Residual oil, which is left over in the refining process after gasoline and other products have been removed from the crude, was introduced into the east-coast industrial markets from Venezuela and the Dutch West Indies on a somewhat modest scale. The 45 million barrels which flowed to our shores in 1946 were not too discernible as a threat to the domestic economy in a period of high industrial activity, but as these conditions began to level off, the intruder insisted on remaining and even widened his area of encroachment.

In 1949, residual oil imports rose to 74 million barrels. While the domestic coal and oil industries were being forced to cut back production, the oil originating in alien refineries pushed ruthlessly forward, the international oil shippers manipulating pricing at dockside in whatever manner was necessary to undersell coal. Congressional hearings were undertaken, and investigators learned that residual oil imports in 1949 had cost the United States coal miner about $45 million in wages and had taken another $25 million from the pay envelopes of railroaders.

In energy value, a ton of bituminous coal equals 4.167 barrels of residual oil. Members of the Congress conducting the hearings realized that, if the shipments from abroad continued to flood U.S. markets, the problem of national security would grow more serious. At the beginning of World War II Germany had only 60 submarines, but they were sufficient to reduce world shipping and to cut off much of the tanker traffic between Texas and New York and other east coast ports. By 1950 Russia was reported to have 300 submarines, so the Senate committee whose membership included the late Matthew M. Neely and the late Robert A. Taft warned that the Nation's defense would be imperiled unless foreign oil were prohibited from continuing to impair coal's ability to retain its proper place in the mobilization base.

How the situation has worsened since those dark days of 1949 is explained in last year's record of residual oil imports. During 1958 a total of 170,900 barrels of residual oil entered the United States. In addition, another 69,500,000 barrels of residual oil was produced in this country from imported crude. In energy value, the direct residual oil imports plus the residual oil coming from foreign crude amounted to 57,700,000 tons of bituminous coal. And meanwhile Russia's submarine force has grown in number to 500.

That is the same situation as it exists today, Mr. Speaker. In 1949 the Nation's coal and railroad industries were badly crippled by the 18 million tons of coal equivalent that came from lands abroad in the form of residual oil. Today that misery has been multiplied by three, and the foreign oil shippers who stood before Senators Neely and Taft pledging their allegiance and responsibility have in the meantime blatantly and arrogantly disregarded every principle of legitimate competition. They have brutally seized every opportunity to grasp increasing shares of the Nation's energy market in full knowledge that their actions have brought unemployment, hunger, and destitution to coal communities in Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Pennsylvania.

Only yesterday I returned from an intensive personal investigation of the employment situation in two counties of my district—Wayne and Lincoln Counties. Mr. Speaker, my great State is in serious economic trouble. Unemployment runs as high as 50 percent in some areas. Children are hungry and their clothes are in tatters. The lamp of hope is flickering. The younger people are leaving the State. One mother tearfully told me yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that her son had been trying to get work for over a year and finally left to try to get a job in Gary, Ind.

We need help, Mr. Speaker. We need to put a legislative check on these shippers who do such great harm to our national economy and security. Let us approve the legislation which my distinguished colleague [Mr. BAILEY] has offered, and let us follow up with a definite quota limitation on the imports of residual oil and of all crude oil and products.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON].

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to join with other Members in paying tribute today to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] for the legislation which he has introduced and to indicate my support for this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I think we are dealing here with a problem which often is discussed in theoretical terms when actually it is a condition occurring in various sections of our country that should concern us. I know that many of us are sympathetic with the broad objectives of reciprocal trade, as the gentleman has already outlined it himself. We recognize that in many cases, for example in the case of Japan, there is a responsibility on our part to contribute as we may be able to build a strong economy in Japan so that the Japanese people can resist communism. But, Mr. Speaker, we also are confronted, as I say, with a condition rather than a theory, a condition of severe unemployment. In my district in New York State, where we have the glove industry, for example, an industry which has been threatened seriously by foreign competition for many years, we are confronted with imports of gloves made in Japan by labor paid 3, 4, and 5 cents an hour, competing with labor which is paid in New York State $1 or $1.25 or $1.50 an hour. This condition, in turn, has resulted in widespread unemployment in the glove industry. A similar condition is now spreading into the carpet industry in the city of Amsterdam, and just the other day this same condition was dramatically underlined in regard to the great turbine industry of the General Electric Co. where, again, because of a differential in wages, one of the great turbine manufacturing plants of the country is being forced to lay off people, while one of the largest contracts for a steam turbine ever let in history is being turned over by the TVA to a British firm. The General Electric Co. and Members of this House have joined in a protest against that award from the point of view of national security. And from the point of view of rising unemployment this is an even more serious problem, too.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia and others today have referred to the escape clause procedure incorporated into the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Let me say that I join with them in their doubts as to whether this escape clause procedure actually gives much escape. Only the other day the carpet industry, which has been very seriously hard hit by unemployment, went before the Tariff Commission for escape clause action and was flatly turned down. If people have to walk the streets completely before there is any recognition of the serious impact of imports, then there is, indeed, need for the corrective legislation which has been advanced by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that all of us are primarily interested in protecting the jobs and welfare of our own people. I think the time for a revaluation of the impact of our foreign trade policies and programs on the important economic needs of our own people is already overdue. Perhaps if our economy were running at full tilt and if we were genuinely committed to full employment, then some of these problems might not have arisen. But when we find that in the face of rising unemployment jobs are being lost and people are being thrown out of work, not by tens but by hundreds, in some of the established industrial sections of our country as a result of our trade policies, then certainly we, as Members of the Congress, have a responsibility to protect the economic welfare of our own people. The bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] is, in my judgment, an important step forward in that direction.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend my thanks to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] for bringing this important subject matter to the attention of the Congress, and I am hopeful that every member of the Committee on Ways and Means will take the opportunity of reading the statements made here on the floor of the House today with reference to that matter.

Mr. Speaker, the President assured us, under the authority delegated to him by Congress, that no domestic industry would be harmed by the Trade Agreements Act.

Besides, was there not an escape clause that would provide a remedy in the event that any American industry suffered as a result of imports that undermined its competitive position at home?

But the escape clause has failed to provide the minimum protection expected from it.

Between 1947 and 1951 the Tariff Commission dismissed most of the applications by American manufacturers seeking to defend themselves from the merciless competition of imports produced by cheap labor abroad.

The Tariff Commission did not bother to explain why it was adhering to a policy that was driving some American manufacturers out of business, pushing thousands of Americans out of their jobs, and turning whole communities into distressed areas.

Exasperated by the indifference of the Tariff Commission, the affected industries worked hard to secure a legislative remedy. Finally, in 1951, the Congress amended the Trade Agreements Act to provide for a statutory escape clause.

It established guidelines for the Commission and insisted on an accounting by that agency whenever it dismissed an application for relief or whenever it decided that there was no injury or threat to the industry seeking tariff protection.

Responding to this congressional action, the Tariff Commission began to take a more realistic view of the situation. It observed injury in many more cases, and recommended to the President that relief measures should be invoked.

At last it appeared that those American industries which were in jeopardy from import competition, would not have to move to some foreign country in order to stay alive.

The Chief Executive of their National Government would surely exercise those powers at his command, to invoke protection under the escape clause.

But now it was the Commission's turn to experience frustration.

In the majority of cases, the President turned down the Commission's recommendations.

By the exercise of his discretionary power, he has nullified the legitimate remedies inherent in the escape clause.

I am not sure whether this administration's preoccupation with foreign affairs is responsible for this indifference toward industries at home that are suffering from the severe competition of imports, or whether it considers these industries as expendable.

In any event, this arbitrary action by the President, ignoring the Congress, its constitutional authority over tariffs and trade, and the agency it established to carry out its intent, is a sweeping assumption of power that is worrying American industries and American workers.

The door to relief provided by law has been closed.

The escape clause has been repealed by the administration's refusal to recognize the harm that has been done to specific American industries, and by its refusal to invoke the remedies provided by the Trade Agreements Extension Act. Bear in mind that other nations recognized our right to invoke the escape clause, where the facts justified its use.

I maintain that the administration is not following due process of law.

It is not enough to assert that it is right. It must cite clear evidence, in each case, to support its conclusions.

Legislation to make the escape clause effective where its use is warranted by the facts, and to protect the public's right to know, is imperative.

For that purpose, I suggest that we amend and adjust the Trade Agreements Act.

Look at the high and continuing level of unemployment, and there you will see the warning that we must correct the abuses in the administration's conduct of our tariff policy.

Mr. Speaker, I am in complete agreement with what Members have said about the need of legislation to make it possible to regulate import competition so that our industry has a chance to live and operate according to American standards. This includes maintenance of a wage standard that creates the necessary purchasing power to sustain our industry.

In this connection I want to say that new legislation would not be necessary if the President would carry out the recommendations of the Tariff Commission. Unfortunately the findings of the Commission have found little favor at the White House. I say this is unfortunate because there is no point in having a Tariff Commission if the President is going to make his own decisions in any case. Since the Congress has the responsibility of regulating foreign commerce and has also to make the tariff, we cannot give this function away. We can indeed set up a Commission, as we have done, but this must not be a subterfuge whereby the Congress can toss its function over to the President. The responsibility is still ours.

When the President overrides the Tariff Commission he in fact sets himself up above the level of Congress. He makes the final decision as if he were the court of last resort in a field that belongs exclusively to Congress under the Constitution.

Since the President has ignored the mandate of the law under the escape clause that says that no concession is to remain in effect if it results in serious injury or a threat of serious injury to a domestic industry and has elected to substitute his own judgment for that of the Tariff Commission, the agency created by Congress to act for it, it is clear that further legislation is necessary. I may say that it is necessary if the very words of the three Presidents since the trade agreements program was first enacted are themselves to be honored. We have heard repeated references to the promises and assurances of the Presidents that the trade agreements were not intended to hurt American industry unduly or seriously.

Mr. Speaker, I can testify to the fact that the textile industry has indeed been hurt and hurt grievously by imports. The injury was inflicted as long as 3 years ago and is still continuing. Yet no action has been taken under the escape clause. Instead the President has given his blessings to an arrangement with Japan by which that country undertakes to limit its own exports to this country. This is not a satisfactory disposition of the problem. It takes it completely out of the field of law and out of the range of orderly and regular procedure, to be disposed of by the executive branch as it alone sees fit, with no legal recourse by the domestic industry. The whole negotiations were carried on secretly and behind the scenes. No semblance of notice was given. No hearings were held. Nothing was given out to the public setting forth what was under way nor what was the subject of negotiation. Other such arrangements have been made and others are said to be contemplated. This course of action is nothing more nor less than regulation of foreign commerce without even the consultation of Congress. At this point I wish to insert into the RECORD an editorial from the Meriden (Conn.) Record of February 14 entitled "Quotas Are Made To Be Broken." It refers to the Japanese self-imposed export quota on stainless steel flatware. The Japanese established such a quota for 1958. They were to ship not over 5,500,000 dozen pieces to this country in 1958. Yet, according to our Department of Commerce figures they had shipped 6,954,914 dozen in the first 10 months.

QUOTAS ARE MADE TO BE BROKEN

When is a quota not a quota?

The answer, apparently, is when it is voluntarily undertaken by the Japanese. At least that is the conclusion to be drawn from the experience of the U.S. steel flatware industry.

The flatware industry, as the people of Meriden and Wallingford have reason to know so well, has been seriously harmed by the importation of stainless steel flatware from Japan. So serious was this competition, that the U.S. Tariff Commission in 1958 unanimously found that American industry was severely harmed by foreign imports and it recommended the withdrawal of all concessions under GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.)

Quick to anticipate a loss to their newfledged stainless steel flatware industry, the Japanese offered a voluntary quota proposal which President Eisenhower accepted rather than follow the Tariff Commission recommendations for a withdrawal of concessions. Under the agreement, the Japanese were pledged to a voluntary quota of 5,500,000 dozen pieces of stainless flatware for 1958.

The U.S. flatware industry accepted the quota with resignation and with misgivings, and the misgivings were justified. The U.S. Bureau of Census has reported that for the first 10 months of 1958 imports of Japanese stainless flatware reached 6,954,914 dozen, and at this rate, it is likely that the total imports for 1958 may have been more than 8,500,000 dozen.

The unfairness of the Japanese competition in the U.S. flatware market is a familiar story in this area. American flatware makers pioneered in the manufacture of stainless; they promoted the product and established the market for it among American housewives. Then, in 1955, the Japanese, recognizing the ready-made market, began moving in, with the help of tariff concessions from GATT.

Japanese entry into the flatware market was solely for export purposes. A nation which eats with chopsticks has no use for knives, forks, and spoons, except to sell them. Japanese stainless sells in the United States for 25 to 50 percent of the price of American-made stainless, simply because the Japanese wage rate is one-tenth of the rates paid in Meriden and Wallingford factories, and because materials cost only half as much in Japan as in this country.

How much further Japan will go in capturing the American flatware market depends upon how much further she is allowed to go. The percentage of Japanese flatware in the total U.S. stainless and plated flatware consumption ranged from 1.7 percent in 1951 to 29.7 in 1958. As a result, 20 percent of the workers in the U.S. flatware industry have already lost their jobs to Japanese workers, and the end is not in sight.

This is not a problem which the U.S. flatware industry can cope with alone. It must have the help of the Government, not to establish an American monopoly, but at least to bring about conditions of fair competition. The experience of 1958 has proved how valueless is the system of voluntary quotas. Some substantial help along the lines proposed by the U.S. Tariff Commission is in order, and right away is not too soon. Imposition of reasonable mandatory quotas would seem to be part of the answer.

Mr. Speaker, the welfare of those of our industries that are faced with ruinous import competition is being used as a trading pawn in our diplomacy. Particular industries are called upon as sacrificial offerings in behalf of what those who conduct our foreign relations calculate to be best for the country. Imports, in a sense, are given the right of eminent domain. At the same time there is no compensation of those who are deprived of their market and their jobs.

At no time, Mr. Speaker, have the Presidents since 1934 or any of their spokesmen, such as the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and others, indicated that the policy behind the trade-agreements program proposed any such course. Quite the contrary. It was in fact specifically denied. Yet we find the course pursued. In fact, in refusing to accept some of the Tariff Commission's recommendations the President has more than once cited the unfavorable effect that would be produced in our foreign relations if he placed the recommendation into effect.

Mr. William L. Clayton, former Under Secretary of State and a principal architect of GATT, who has already been quoted on the floor, spoke positively to the Ways and Means Committee on this point. This is what he said as he testified in favor of extension of the Trade Agreements Act:

> The charge has been made that these agreements are often made, and concessions are often granted, as to our import duties, for political or diplomatic reasons. I can assure you gentlemen that * * * I have known of no single case in which that has been done.
> We make these agreements purely on economic grounds in order to try to increase the international trade of the United States.

That was very plain speaking and leaves no room for a double interpretation. Concessions in trade agreements were made strictly on economic grounds and no other.

If concessions were to be made solely on economic grounds, it follows that their modifications or withdrawal in accordance with the escape clause should also be made solely on economic grounds. There should be none but economic justification for rescinding a concession that was granted on purely economic grounds. The kind of justification to be invoked was spelled out in the escape clause as adopted by Congress in 1951 and as subsequently amended. This justification is serious injury or a threat of such injury to a domestic industry attributable in part to trade-agreement concession. That is the only consideration provided in the law, and nothing else can properly be read into it. Yet the President regularly cites other reasons for rejecting Tariff Commission recommendations.

This is not as it should be. If the law as it stands were carried out there would be much less opposition to the trade agreements program. Our industry would find it possible to live with the program. There would be no unjustified interference with trade. Import competition would simply be placed on a fair basis and thus prevented from disrupting our industries, our employment and our labor standards.

We have several laws that are designed to assure fair competition in interstate commerce. Surely if our antitrust laws are justified; if the Federal Trade Commission is beneficial, no less than other acts such as the Robinson-Patman Act, a law such as the escape clause is equally justified. After all it only seeks to prevent injury from imports that undermine our standards. Also if our minimum wage laws and the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act are justified, both of which are specifically designed to eliminate wage-cutting or the payment of substandard wages as a means of gaining competitive advantage, it is logical and it makes good sense to apply some similar restriction on goods that come into our stream of commerce from the outside. In fact, particularly because we do have these domestic laws, including price supports for farm products, all of which in combination creates higher costs of production, it is all the more necessary to avoid undermining them from beyond our borders.

We have in recent years, hand-in-hand with the tariff-cutting program, helped increase the competitive advantage of other countries. We have helped them set up mass production with the use of modern machinery. This has greatly cut down our previous advantage. Even before we did this many industries in this country found themselves in difficulty with import competition. The situation is now much worse. Many of our industries are opening branch plants abroad or entering into manufacturing arrangements overseas. They are doing this as a means of competing in foreign markets and in some instances they are shipping their foreign output into this country. The leading example is the automobile industry. Everyone knows what this does to employment here.

Having helped industry abroad as extensively as we have, we are under no obligation to maintain specially favorable competitive conditions for imports, giving them advantages that our own industry does not enjoy. Our foreign representatives, our diplomats, and our Secretary of State, should have no difficulty in making our situation clear to other countries. We do not seek exclusion of imports. We ask only that they be placed on a reasonably competitive basis.

I am completely in favor of legislation that will assure means of putting and keeping imports on a fair competitive basis. The legislation offered here today is designed for that purpose and would go no further. Not by the widest stretch of the imagination can it be interpreted as legislation that would lead to a general tariff increase. In 10 years only a small part of our total imports have been covered by the escape clause cases that have come before the Tariff Commission. Even if they had all been decided favorably our imports as a whole would not have been seriously affected. After all, the Tariff Commission itself has found favorably in less than half of the cases. Any fear that imports would be dealt a heavy blow if the escape clause were administered as intended, so that only those concessions would be modified or withdrawn that had been found seriously to injure our industries, is wholly unfounded.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this legislation is given an early hearing by the Ways and Means Committee and that we enact it into law as a simple act of equity; and also as a means of bringing the administration of the Trade Agreements Act into conformity with its professed intent, namely, a program that is mutually beneficial to our own industry and industry abroad.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SILER].

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself, too, with the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] in his espousal of this proposed legislation, H.R. 4846. This is nonpartisan in its nature. It is bipartisan in the interest of all Members who come from districts in the United States that are affected by this legislation.

I come from a great State, down in Kentucky. There we have the best and the topmost basketball team in the United States. At this very moment it is rated as No. 1 in the Nation.

Down there we make half of the world's whisky. I am not proud of that, but it is the greatest whisky-producing State in all of the United States.

There we produce some of the greatest racehorses in all the world. It is the home of Man o' War and many other great racehorses of the past.

We also have some of the prettiest women in the world in Kentucky, so much so that when the male of the species passes one of these beautiful women on the street he is apt to stumble over his own feet and blush for shame because of her beauty; or if he happens to be shaving and looks out the window and sees one of them pass, he may cut his face so that he looks like Custer's last stand. We also have one of the world's greatest and best known underground caverns, the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, said to be one of the seven natural wonders of the world. But, in spite of these superlatives we, in Kentucky, are in trouble in some of the districts of our State. Some of the railroads have been hard hit in their productive employment. Some of the coal mine districts have been practically destroyed and a large part of this destruction comes from the importation of foreign residual oil about which we have been talking and the restriction of which this proposed legislation seeks to enforce.

In Harlan County alone in my State, 10 years ago we had 32 large coal mines which employed many men. Now we have only nine. In 1950 we had a total coal-mine employment in that county of 12,500. But, now the ranks of those coal miners in that county alone have been reduced to 5,000, which is a 60-percent reduction in the employees of one Kentucky county. Suppose the employees in one of the counties of your district had been decreased 60 percent? How would you feel about a measure of this kind? The total population of this same county has declined in the past 10 years or so from 80,000 down to 52,000 and all of this reduction and ruination to this one county has come about in considerable measure because of the importation of foreign residual oil over the past decade or so.

If some of you had visited in some good American homes in depressed areas, as I did last fall, you would have done some weeping unless the milk of human kindness in you has been chilled into ice water or unless the tenderness of your heart has become as tough as shoe leather. The want and the need and the unemployment can all be traced in large measure to the importation of foreign residual oil and its displacement of American miners and American railroad employees.

The merits of the legislation proposed here today have already been explained thoroughly. As representatives of an area where the transportation industries have assumed such an important role from both an economic and security standpoint, I should like to take a moment to point out the inherent danger of a policy which will emaciate that transportation system unless corrective measures are soon taken.

Railroads cannot afford to maintain the coal cars, locomotives, and other facilities necessary for emergency service under present conditions. Because bituminous coal demand has experienced such substantial decreases as a consequence of unbearable competition from foreign residual oil, great quantities of rolling stock are rusting away and otherwise deteriorating on railroad sidings. In 1957, almost 14,000 open hoppers were retired—approximately 1,000 more than the new cars ordered at the end of the year. In 1958, a total of 21,898 were retired as against an order of only 13,822 new cars.

In these figures are grave danger to the national defense. There is ample evidence that not enough coal can be produced to meet emergency conditions unless mine capacity is maintained in the interim period. Assuming, however, that output could somehow keep up with demand, the fact remains that this coal would be of no practical value if left at the mine mouth. Its serviceability is realized only when it reaches points of consumption. Unless an active, vigorous transportation system is kept in ready condition, we are just not going to have the cars necessary if the international tension line is snapped at Berlin, the Middle East, or at any of the other trouble spots around the world, resulting in total and catastrophic war.

While I have only mentioned railroads and coal, there are other industries affected by overdoses of imports that also have my earnest consideration. In the interest of time I shall not make a detailed listing of those industries and businesses that need to be sheltered under the self-preservation umbrella of the proposed legislation. I ask the House to give the railroad workers, the miners, and all employees whose jobs have been washed away by excessive imports—give us this legislation and whatever other laws are necessary to restore employment in my State and yours.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein two newspaper articles pertinent to the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] for an opportunity to say a few words on the import situation in my part of the country, the State of Maine. I have been greatly impressed by the evidence presented here this afternoon of growing concern over the competitive situation in the United States as we face the rising tide of imports. From all accounts, from the expression of industrial leaders in a variety of industries, it is becoming clear that this country is losing rapidly its hitherto solid competitive standing in world trade.

All sorts of evidence is accumulating that we are pricing ourselves out of world markets. That spells a decline in our exports or a yet heavier subsidization of our exports if we insist on maintaining them at a high level. At the same time it obviously has another meaning. It means that our domestic industries are becoming more rather than less exposed to low-cost imports. We are finding it more difficult to compete with imports for the same reason that our exports are no longer able to find as ready a market abroad as before.

Our higher wages, despite our industrial advancement, result in higher unit costs than prevail in other countries, where low wages are now being combined with machinery that is just as good as our own and in some cases more modern. For many years our higher wages in the mass production industries were no competitive handicap in exporting and did not open us up to heavy import competition. Even that is undergoing a change. Our smaller and less mechanized industries have long had great difficulty in competing with imports. Today they find it more difficult than ever before.

In my district there are plants that make hardwood plywood, others that make wooden spring clothespins, and, of course, we have the remains of a once thriving textile industry. Each of these three industries has been hard hit by imports. They are all desperate for a remedy against the great damage that has been inflicted on them by imports.

[From the Kennebec Journal, Augusta, Feb. 19, 1959]

IMPORTS VERSUS JOBS

It is a matter of concern to textile labor and management in Maine, in New England—anywhere in this country, in fact—that foreign exporters of cotton textiles to this country should start clamoring for trade, not aid, at the very first United States suggestion that they should impose some voluntary controls upon themselves.

Sooner or later the question boils down to something like this: Are the jobs of Oriental textile workers as important to the political and economic well-being of the United States as are the jobs of textile workers in Augusta, Waterville, Lewiston, Biddeford, and other American cities?

Trade, not aid, shouted an English-language newspaper in Hong Kong, the British crown colony off the China coast, the other day when U.S. Assistant Secretary of Commerce Henry Kearns arrived there and commented—rather mildly, it semed to us—on the precipitous and alarming increase in Hong Kong's textile shipments to the United States.

And the Hong Kong Chamber of Commerce publicly charged that attacks in this country on Hong Kong's increasing textile exports have been unscrupulous and dishonest.

But what are Americans supposed to do? Are Americans supposed to stand aside while what remains of the U.S. textile industry and the jobs of thousands of American textile mill employes are sacrificed—in order to provide more and more trade, not aid for textile exporters in Japan, in Hong Kong, in India, in Egypt and elsewhere around the globe?

Thus far our Government hasn't had the heart to erect tariff barriers that would halt all textile importation into this country for the protection of domestic textile workers. All it has done has been to politely request foreign exporters not to overdo it—as the Assistant Secretary of Commerce asked in Hong Kong, the other day.

But textile mill jobs are important to people in Augusta, Lewiston, Biddeford and elsewhere in Maine. They're important to a lot of people in Massachusetts, Connecticut, North and South Carolina and elsewhere around the country. They deserve the fullest protection this Government can give them.

Of course there will be denunciations of U.S. policy abroad, whenever that policy cuts a little into exporters' profits—as in the Hong Kong incident, which stirred a hornets' nest merely because a U.S. official had suggested that a little voluntary policing of competition for more of the U.S. market would be appreciated.

But which matters most, to Washington—the welfare of foreign exporters, or the jobs of thousands of U.S. millworkers?

It ought not to be necessary even to have to ask such a question.

Mr. Speaker, I am not pleading for lower wages. I am saying that if we are going to maintain the high wage standards of this country it is time that we do something to make it possible to sustain them against the onslaught from without. It is clear that we cannot hold them if we allow imports from low-wage and slave areas of the world a free run of our market. For example, Mr. Speaker, please note this attempt of Russia to penetrate our paper pulp industry.

[From the Portland Sunday Telegram, Feb. 22, 1959]

IT'S COMING IN—CHEAP RUSSIAN WOODPULP WORRIES MAINE PAPER MILLS

(By Harold J. Boyle)

Maine businessmen developed a mild case of jitters Saturday when they studied reports of a mounting flow of foreign-made goods headed for this country.

Biggest shock to Maine was the report that Russia will ship 20,000 tons of woodpulp to a Connecticut importer at a price of $115 a ton, or $40 under the standard U.S. price of $155 a ton. This woodpulp makes bleached sulphite, which is used by several Maine companies in their fine-grade papers.

Maine paper manufacturers agreed that 20,000 tons will not immediately affect the industry in this State. But they showed genuine concern over the Connecticut importer's hint that he hopes to step up these shipments to 200,000 tons a year.

"Two hundred thousand tons of Russian pulp imported into this country at that low price would be bad—very bad—for the Maine paper industry," an S. D. Warren official at Westbrook said Saturday night.

Also disturbing was the same Connecticut importer's "hopes" for marketing Russian newsprint in the United States. Newsprint is one of Maine's largest industries. It is operating under capacity at this time due to a surplus throughout this country and Canada.

The report on Russia's invasion into the U.S. paper-pulp market appeared Friday in a national magazine, Business Week.

It said that the Orbit Sales Co., Inc., of New Haven, Conn., made a deal for the 20,000 tons of Russian woodpulp at $115 a ton, delivered in this country. It quoted Orbit's president, saying he had an ultimate goal of 200,000 tons, or the same amount England is buying this year. "And we may start buying newsprint," the magazine quotes Louis Zemel, the Orbit president.

CAN UPSET MARKET

The national magazine said that trade analysts in the Commerce and State Departments do not expect a sizable increase in Soviet-U.S. trade at this time. But it added that these Government analysts "don't underestimate the damage the Russians can do by upsetting markets through well timed cut rate sales."

Foreign imports made news on another Maine front last week. Maine steel fabricators said they were offered steel from Luxembourg at $32 a ton under U.S. prices of $135 a ton. These offerings are for reinforcing steel used in the construction industry. Little, if any, is being bought in Maine today.

One Portland fabricator said Saturday that a bid for a small construction job in this State several weeks ago indicated that the contractor would use foreign steel. He didn't get the job.

FOREIGN STEEL A PROBLEM

None of the foreign steel can be used on Federal or State projects in Maine, these fabricators believe. But they point out that contractors bidding on private construction work in this State may specify the lower priced foreign steel to get the work during the current letdown in the construction industry.

The threat of lower price foreign goods is being felt in Maine about a year after it hit other sections. Japan has been landing steel plates about $20 a ton under U.S. prices on the west coast the past 12 months. It is reported to have captured 52 percent of the barbed wire market in this country in that 12-month period.

From what has been presented here on the floor and to which I have listened with great interest, it is almost unbelievable that the necessary remedy should be withheld. If the trade agreements into which we entered were to be mutually beneficial both at home and abroad and if it is against the policy to injure seriously our own industries, as has been so steadfastly maintained by all the public officials who have given testimony in support of the trade agreements, then it is indeed hard to reconcile the disposition of cases under the escape clause.

I am greatly concerned that the industries in my area that are suffering from import competition not only be assured of a remedy by highly placed executive officials in a general way, but actually have extended to them the policy of no injury that has been so widely proclaimed. Mere words of assurance are no substitute for the action that is needed to set things right competitively.

No one here this afternoon has asked for embargoes or shutting off of trade; nor do I. We profit from trade when it is mutually beneficial; and we should have as much mutually beneficial trade as possible. We do not profit from trade that severely injures one side of the deal; and that is the situation in the textile industry in Maine, in the plywood industry, and in the wooden clothespin industry.

What we need is such a degree of regulation of imports, preferably by import quota, as will insure our domestic industry of its fair share of our own market. That is all we ask and that is what we need if we are going to pull our weight in the economy and our share of the tax and employment burden of the country.

The bill that has been introduced would square practice with preachment and would get rid of what can only impress the people back home as doubletalk.

Mr. Speaker, if we are looking for an explanation of the contradiction between the trade-agreements policy as it is given out for home consumption and what actually is done in the showdown we have but to take notice of what is going on right now.

Assistant Secretary of Commerce Henry Kearns has just completed a trip to the Far East where he visited several countries and spoke quite freely. In Bangkok, Thailand, he had this to say:

While it is necessary for our Government to occasionally impose import restrictions when it appears that an industry may be unduly damaged, it has generally been the policy of the United States to keep such restrictions to an absolute minimum. The result has been a substantial lowering of restrictions whether they be tariffs or quotas. It is our intention to progress much further in this area of freer trade.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to a little globetrotting by an Assistant Secretary of Commerce. The Commerce Department has its commercial attachés in various embassies reporting through the State Department, and the Assistant Secretary for International Affairs is entitled to know from firsthand observation how well our far-flung representation is functioning.

On the other hand, it is the constitutional function of Congress to regulate our foreign commerce and to make our tariff. It is therefore incumbent upon Congress to make the policy. The executive branch, of which the Department of Congress is a part, carries out the policies and the laws passed by Congress to express these policies.

What then should be the limitations on Mr. Kearns as he travels in the Far East, one of the trouble spots in the world? Should he go about making freewheeling speeches that are intended to bind Congress? For example, when Mr. Kearns says that it is our intention to progress much further in this area of freer trade, is he speaking for your constituents or mine? Or for whom is he speaking? Who gave him his commission to go abroad and engage in the regulation of foreign commerce? Our trade policy is a controversial issue. What the last Congress did or what this Congress does cannot bind an ensuing Congress. How then can Mr. Kearns with all confidence say what is our intention as a nation?

Mr. Kearns went to Hong Kong, whose exports of textiles to this country have been skyrocketing. There he ran into great hostility as reported by the press. Hong Kong has developed into what appears to be a wide loophole in the Japanese self-imposed export quota on cotton textiles. Evidently they had little time for Mr. Kearns.

In Japan Mr. Kearns undertook to bring about closer agreement on the yardage of cotton goods that Japan will ship to this country under her voluntary export quota plan. Japan seeks an expansion beyond last year's quota of 235 million yards.

Mr. Kearns is quoted in the Daily News Record as having said in Tokyo on February 19 that the U.S. Government was only trying to advise on a Japanese quota which we hope will prevent our Congress from taking restrictive action. He then added, it is said, at a press conference: "Let's not say Congress—just restrictive action from our side."

Mr. Speaker, I think this visit of Mr. Kearns and what he said in Bangkok, his reception in Hong Kong, and his negotiations in Tokyo give an excellent example of how and why the trade agreements program has become so highly suspect by the domestic industries that have suffered so harshly from its administration. His visit muddies the waters and much of what he said is out of order. According to the news report that I have quoted, Mr. Kearns reportedly said to the Vice Foreign Minister of Japan, Hisanari Yamada:

Some Congressmen raising a hue and cry against foreign products are urging import restrictions but their fuss is just for public consumption.

If true, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Kearns should, upon his return to this country, be asked to explain his statement in all its unfortunate implications.

The sooner we bring the regulation of our foreign commerce back into its proper channels the less will it get fouled up in unnecessary and irresponsible actions of itinerant executive officials fishing in water that lies outside their domain. For this reason among others I am in favor of the legislation proposed here today.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Maine.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I join the gentleman from West Virginia in the long and effective fight that he has made over the years.

Particularly I want to call attention to those Members who are present here today and who have heard a great number of the proponents of the so-called Liberal Trade Agreements Act say that the only thing American industry had to do was to produce cheaply enough and they would not have to fear foreign competition. It may be interesting to note that there is one industry that has succeeded, through the utilization of the technical advancements within that industry, to place that industry in the enviable position of being able to produce cheaper than any other nation on the face of the earth. I am speaking of the coal industry of the United States. Without aid from the Government, without assistance of any kind, they have been able to produce in their latest venture as much as 47 tons of coal per day per man. This compares to 1½ tons of coal per day per man in Europe, and 11 tons per day per man on a national evaluation. What has this meant? It has meant that this industry, without aid from the Government, has been able to compete in the foreign markets. But what have the foreign markets done to protect themselves? They have not taken the terrible position that our free traders and spokesmen for the liberal trade policy have taken. They have deliberately, willingly, and knowingly passed a direct tariff upon American coal that has invaded their market. They have done it with the simple, lone excuse that it meant employment for their coal producers, the very thing that we abhor, the very thing that we stay away from, the very thing that we cannot mention in the Halls of Congress.

Why, the protection of American jobs has become so outmoded and so far out of tune with the present-day thinking that we are supposed to give away American opportunities in order that we may have friends somewhere overseas. I will tell you this much about friends, and I think every one of us knows it, that the friends you give something to do not remain your friends very long. To lose a friend, just lend him money, and to lose these friends of ours overseas, just let them take us for suckers, and suckers we are in every instance where there has been an injury, because we have failed to invoke the so-called escape clause.

I know that the tartaric acid industry is small, but what happened to it is significant: When the United States had a tariff of 8 cents a pound on tartaric acid and 5 cents a pound on cream of tartar our industry was able to compete with the other producers all over the world. Then we turned over to GATT—that superstructure in our foreign economic field, not with the consent of Congress but by action of the State Department and the President—when GATT took charge of affairs they lowered the tariff on tartaric acid to 5 cents and on cream of tartar to 2½ cents. The producer, and the lone producer in the United States of any consequence, petitioned under the escape clause. He was denied relief. In December of 1957 he went completely out of business and left this country without one producer of tartaric acid and cream of tartar. Subsequent action was taken by the Tariff Commission after production had been closed in the United States. It recommended, and GATT approved, a tariff of 12 cents a pound on tartaric acid, a 50 percent increase, more than was ever needed or we were interested in, and 7½ cents a pound, another increase of 50 percent, on cream of tartar.

This example I have just given you is just one little beginning in the gnawing away process that is being used to deliberately undermine the American way of life and American standards of life and American labor's freedom to compete in world markets.

Now let us go to another phase of this matter. The differential a generation ago between wages paid in this country and wages paid in Europe was greater than the differential is today. It has been said that labor and labor costs in our country make the principal difference in competitive prices, especially in the case of the TVA generators. Let me tell you this, that if the American men working in the Westinghouse Corp. in East Pittsburgh, my home district, were to work for absolutely nothing, if they were to take not one nickel for all their labor, there would still be a difference of $2,500,000 between their bid and the successful British bidder on certain big generators. So there is something besides the wage of the American working man that enters into the cost picture in TVA contracts.

I have with me hundreds of letters, petitions, and telegrams from my constituents protesting the action of TVA and REA in purchasing electrical equipment from foreign concerns. I do not intend to include all of these; however, two of them appear to cover the gist of the volume of correspondence I have received. Therefore, I submit the letters from Mr. A. E. Lo Buono, 200 Susan Drive, Irwin, Pa., and Mr. and Mrs. Bernard R. Sinwell, Main Street, Westmoreland City, Pa., respectively:

DEAR MR. DENT: I recently became aware of the fact that the U.S. Government is making it their policy to buy an increasing amount of electrical equipment from companies in foreign countries. This is a matter of deep concern to me, as I am employed by the Westinghouse Electric Corp., and my job security depends on my company's getting orders.

I understand that just recently an order for a large steam-turbine generator to be built for the Tennessee Valley Authority was awarded to a firm in England. I also understand that if Westinghouse had received this order, it would have meant 1,080,000 manhours of work for employees of our company and another 375,000 hours of work for employees of suppliers to Westinghouse, or the equivalent of jobs for 700 people for 1 full year. If times get hard this coming year and I am put on short time, the memory of that loss is really going to hurt.

I realize that you are only one in the House of Representatives, but I feel that if you would use your influence to bring this to the attention of others in Congress, eventually results would become evident. I would appreciate your investigation of this serious problem, and hope that we as job holders and breadwinners for our families will not suffer as a result of unwise action on the part of the Government.

Very truly yours,

A. E. LO BUONO.

DEAR MR. DENT: For some time we have been concerned about the increasing amounts of electrical equipment the Government of this country has been purchasing from foreign firms, particularly the important order for the Nation's biggest steam-turbine generator, to be built for the Tennessee Valley Authority, which was awarded to C. A. Parsons, Ltd., a firm in England. I understand the TVA awarded this order completely within the present Government policy.

Personally, I feel such electrical equipment should be purchased in this country, primarily as a national safeguard, also to provide additional employment which is so desperately needed today. This would also benefit our Government taxwise by the increased employment.

Why should our Government be so concerned about the people of England when they refuse to buy such equipment outside their own country.

I think it is high time our Government wake up and face reality instead of worrying about the people of England. It is quite obvious our Government has done more than its share in helping England, without taking money out of the workingman's pocket to help them when the fact remains that England has done so little in return.

I, for one, have voted and have helped elect you as our Representative in hope of having the welfare of the American people at heart.

I feel that when you appreciate the feeling of the American people on this subject, you will take the necessary steps to remedy this situation.

Very respectfully yours,

Mr. and Mrs. BERNARD R. SINWELL.

The fact remains, although hidden in trick phrases, catch slogans, and deliberate falsehoods, that the United States never could compete in the world market on price and price alone.

The only reason we were able to ship goods was because our American market was intact, it was all ours. After we provided our needs we had goods which we sent abroad at cheaper prices than we charged here at home.

That was before we started building up competitive enterprises abroad. Now, we have lost our dumping grounds for our surplus goods, but we have opened up our private oyster beds to the poachers from all over the world.

American labor has always been paid proportionally higher wages than in foreign countries. In fact, I would venture to say that the differential was even greater a generation ago. Today all the blame for our loss of not only foreign markets, but our own markets as well, is placed at the door of labor.

Certainly our labor is high, but so are the taxes that labor pays and by the same token, the same goes for industry.

When we started giving preferential treatment to foreign investment and made it more profitable to manufacture abroad and sell it here, we put the first nail into the coffin of the American economy.

Every industry in America has felt the competitive pinch from American-owned or controlled production facilities operating in low economy nations shipping into the United States.

One Pennsylvania rubber company lost 1½ million yards of production because the American manufacturer of raincoats, their customer, moved his operations to Japan.

Another New England hardware manufacturer moved lock, stock, and barrel to Italy, but he still sells his product on the American market. In every line we find the American shelves carrying goods once supplied by American capital and American workmen.

Recently a report was circulated showing how disastrous the importation of tartaric acid in the United States has become. The largest producer of tartaric acid in the United States has just closed his plant.

The "know it alls" will point their fingers at American labor and yet the simple fact of the matter is that Congress is to blame indirectly. The reciprocal trade agreements are no longer subject to congressional review and under this arrangement many strange deals have been made.

For instance, we will import $1 million worth of tartaric acid in exchange for American pharmaceuticals. The Spaniards may be getting the medicine, but it is the American economy that needs it.

We have built up the West German economy to such extent that we just cannot bid against their steel producers. An order for $150 million worth of steel and pig iron was sold by West Germany to the Argentine nation by the monopolistic Thysen steel combine. It might be good to remember at this point that we do not allow monopolies here, family or no family ownership.

With the way our Government is running things, it is just possible that American money and machinery produced the steel in West Germany and American money financed the purchase by the Argentine Government. Who knows?

A contractor building bridges buys his steel in Germany, ships it here, and ships American dollars and American payrolls over there while we have some 28 million to 30 million tons of steel capacity idle and thousands of steel workers unemployed.

The story of underbidding by electrical equipment workers in England and Switzerland is becoming a threat that can no longer be treated lightly.

For instance, the three generators for the Ice Harbor lock and dam on the Snake River. The British bid $5 million, General Electric bid $5.44 million. The difference was 9 percent. That 9 percent difference will not pay the difference in taxes paid by our American producer and the unemployment compensation, social security, hospitalization, and all the other payroll costs assessed by Government and not the manufacturer who is still expected to compete for his own Government's business.

This story has been and is being repeated over and over in Government sponsored or financed projects. What happens when private utilities follow their Government into bringing foreign power-producing equipment into this country?

One thing we have to make up our minds to. We have to make a decision. We are either going to be a producing nation or a buying nation.

If we are not to be producers and if we are going to be buyers, we better find something for our producers to do because we just cannot maintain our highly touted standard of living without production payrolls.

This is not isolationist talk, it's just plain horse sense; not showhorse, but just plain workhorse sense.

For the record, here are a few excerpts from wires from workers in some of the affected industries. Under unanimous consent, I submit some for the RECORD at this point:

There is an increasing awareness of the spot we find ourselves in. Most of us want to help our neighbors. Most of us are not afraid of a competitive trade race if we start even. The start won't be even until our foreign competitors pay their labor decent wages, give them the social benefits we enjoy, give them universal schooling, good roads, free elections, pay their share for mutual protection and policing the world's peace. That will take another generation; in the meantime, we can't continue the present program without destroying or lowering our own standard of living. The choice will take courage, but choose we must.

Four to five million production workers on the chronic unemployment lists of this Nation spells disaster.

The only use for it is to rekindle the American pride in America and all its institutions, its industries, its labor, its educational systems, its rocks and rills, its templed hills.

Americans will pay backbreaking taxes; yes, we will complain about them, but if the revenues are spent for America and Americans, we will pay them less grudgingly.

EISENHOWER CANNOT SLOUGH HIS RESPONSIBILITY

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, a very fine editorial appearing in the February 13, 1959, issue of the Florida Times-Union has been called to my attention, and after a careful reading of the subject matter I thought it would be fitting to bring it to the attention of my colleagues. It is believed that the point of view expressed by the Times-Union will be shared by a great majority of the membership of this body and I am glad to insert it in the RECORD. The editorial follows:

EISENHOWER CAN'T SLOUGH HIS RESPONSIBILITY

The intended purpose is quite clear of the Justice Department's release of papers showing that Little Rock Mayor Woodrow Wilson Mann urgently requested President Eisenhower to send troops to Little Rock in 1957. The President would like to slough some of the responsibility for that infamous decision. This he cannot do because of the very nature of executiveship.

The mere attempt gives tragic insight into the man now in the White House. As a soldier, Eisenhower has spent most of his life acquiring a working knowledge of the chain of command, which is the central element of all military discipline and effective action. He must have heard a million times that responsibility within the chain of command flows both up and down in a delicate balance. He has professed great admiration for the system and, indeed, brought it with him to Washington. Yet at the moment of domestic crisis, the President forgot the lesson repeated to him so many times. He acted outside the chain of command. The tragic nature of this incident can be compared only to the experience of Sir Anthony Eden, who trained for an entire lifetime to be Prime Minister of England, and when he finally got the job and was faced with the crisis of Suez he was not equal to it.

Unlike Eden, President Eisenhower certainly was aware of his error. The 17-month delay in releasing the news of the telegram indicates this. He knew that the chain of command between a mayor and the President must include the Governor, no matter how much either disapproves of the individual holding that office. He also must have known that total responsibility for one's decisions is the terrible burden of all executiveship.

This responsibility is indivisible; it cannot be shared. The combat commander alone has responsibility for the lives of the men he leads into battle. The labor leader must assume complete responsibility for the turmoil of the strikes he calls. A corporation president has total responsibility for his company's profits or losses. A President keeps the responsibility for the use of troops against the people of a State. Any attempt by any of these executives to wiggle from under their responsibilities borders upon being petty.

It is easy to predict that the purpose of releasing Mayor Mann's message will not be achieved. All men, even Presidents of the United States, are judged by their fellow men and by their own consciences. In this case, the judgment already has been made by both.

REPLY TO CRITICISMS OF 615 ECONOMISTS' VIEWS ON INFLATION, UNEMPLOYMENT, AND RELATED ISSUES

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, February 11, the Joint Economic Committee released a most important report dealing with inflation and unemployment, and such related issues as monetary policies, tax policies, and so on. It is a brief report. It gives a statistical summary of the views which 615 economists on the faculties of the country's leading universities and colleges hold on these subjects. The basis of the report is a questionnaire which the committee sent out last summer, to obtain the judgments and views of academic economists on these matters of public interest.

Since I was chairman of the committee at the time these questionnaires were sent out, and during the period when most of the work was done in compiling the answers, I issued a press release announcing a publication of the report, and transmitting copies of the report to the news services.

On the next day—Wednesday—the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS] addressed the House on the subject of this report and my press release. He pointed out that my press release contained a statistical error. My release cited a figure which did not agree with the figure shown in the report from which it was supposed to have been taken. I am indebted to the gentleman, both for his alertness in spotting the discrepancy and for his so ably calling attention to it. Also, I have noticed that the gentleman was kind enough to suggest the possibility that I simply made an error—which I take to mean that he concedes a possibility that the error was unintentional—and I appreciate his generosity in that respect.

If our colleague had properly corrected my error and done no more, I would be content. But that is not the case.

MANY BIG ERRORS SUBSTITUTED FOR ONE SMALL ERROR

In attempting to correct my statistical error, he substituted an error of much greater magnitude. More than that I feel that my colleague may have used my error to springboard a speech going into other aspects of the report which it would have been better if he had not gone into.

Certainly the gentleman had a perfect right to issue any statement or make any address about the report he cared to. This is understood. I must point out, however, that the gentleman's statement on Wednesday contains several quite serious errors which require comment. It made several new statistical errors. It gave a highly misleading impression of the report and the views of the 615 economists. It made an unfair and completely unfounded charge that the economists on the faculties of our universities and colleges are biased in favor of maximum employment at any cost. It questioned the value of the committee's report and the value of the economists' views. And, finally, my colleague recommended that in the future the views of the academic economists be left unsolicited and unknown, ending with ringing denunciations. I quote:

> What are economic facts cannot be determined by selecting a group of experts, however expert, and obtaining their majority vote by letter ballot. What is true is not changed one jot or tittle by the proclamations of thunderous majorities.

Now what, may we ask, is the "truth" that is not changed? And what are the economic facts that are to be determined? Is the official propaganda line to be taken as truth and all else error? Are the pronouncements from the White House to be taken as "economic fact" and all disagreements as merely biased opinions? Are we to listen only to the thunderous voice of big business and hear no other advice or counsel?

I suggest the gentleman's whole philosophy is in error.

ON ECONOMIC ISSUES ECONOMISTS' VIEWS SHOULD BE SOUGHT, NOT SILENCED

Obviously there are no certain truths or "economic facts" by which we can answer such questions as whether we can have both full employment and stable prices; whether a given degree of inflation is better or worse than the consequences, if there are consequences; whether stronger antitrust policies would stop price increases; and so on. We are dealing here with policy questions for which there are no answers but judgments and opinions. We are dealing with questions over which group interests are in hard conflict and the sharpest ideological struggles are taking place. We should not close our ears to all voices but the voices on one side. And we must, I think, obtain as much expert and objective judgment and opinion as we can get.

Certainly the economists' knowledge is an incomplete and imperfect knowledge. They are the first to state that. And perhaps their opinions are influenced to some degree by propaganda.

Where judgments and opinions are uncertain, perhaps there is a tendency to adopt and express what seems the authoritative view. And, of course, the big-business community is almost always able to surround its position with what seems to be the highest authority.

And perhaps, too, some of the academic economists are consciously or unconsciously motivated by personal interests. If they aspire to large opportunities for research, as most seem to, they must hope to be favored with grants from one of the foundations which are so generously endowed with big corporations' money. Then, too, since the courts ruled a few years ago that corporate gifts to schools may be deducted from taxes, our colleges and universities have become to an important extent dependent on how the corporation executives decide to dispense this tax money.

And perhaps, too, there is a natural selection influencing the choice of faculty members. The trustees and advisory boards of the colleges and universities are made up largely of big businessmen and big bankers, not labor leaders, small businessmen, farmers, or consumer representatives. I doubt whether there is much tendency for economists whose views are too much out of step with the views of big business to be selected as faculty members.

Biases there may be. But if so, I suggest they are in the direction of my colleague's party line, not the other way. And I suggest that he demands too much.

These economists have been asked to give their judgments and opinions on matters in which they are at least much more expert than the rest of us. Their expertness makes them at least a little more immune to propaganda, and at least a little better prepared to give sound opinions on the tough economic problems than most of the rest of us. And at least they are more objective than the councils of big business from which pours most of the economic opinions on public policy.

Certainly their judgments and opinions are worth obtaining, and they ought to be carefully weighed.

I might add that the individual economists who were invited to answer the committee's questionnaire were not selected by the committee. A supply of the forms was sent to the head of the economics department in each of 150 institutions granting higher degrees in economics, and the department head was asked to pass them out. The list of institutions was compiled by the Office of Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

BANKERS CHANGED THE ARGUMENT FOR HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT

As to whether the committee's questionnaire has any value, let me point out where it has already proved of quite significant value.

The questionnaire was sent to the economists last summer. The No. 1 question put to the economists was whether or not they think we can have in this country both a high level of employment and a high degree of stability in the general price level and by feasible means.

In other words, this questionnaire opened up for question what had become by then a foregone conclusion in big business and banking circles, and the questionnaire received considerable publicity in the banking and trade journals. A basic tenet of the official propaganda line was being questioned.

For at least 4 years, to my knowledge, big bankers and big business executives had been conducting a sales campaign to persuade themselves and the rest of the country that our declared national policy of maintaining maximum employment, maximum production and purchasing power could be achieved only with disastrous inflation.

During 1954 and 1955, the subject of amending the Employment Act of 1946 became the speech topic of every big-business executive or banker called upon to make a speech to other businessmen or bankers. And then, at the beginning of 1956, in celebration of the 10th anniversary of the Employment Act of 1946, the public drive was launched. We were told from all sides that the act must be amended to make "price stability" a goal co-equal with the other goals stated in the act. Mere flag waving? Perhaps. But the people behind this drive did not think so. They thought then, and think now, that such an amendment will have quite real effects. They think it will serve as a mandate to have continuous unemployment of 5 percent, 6 percent, 7 percent—who knows how much more?

ECONOMISTS BELIEVE BOTH HIGH EMPLOYMENT AND HIGH DEGREE OF PRICE STABILITY ARE FEASIBLE

An overwhelming majority of the 615 economists who answered this questionnaire have expressed the view that it is entirely feasible for this country to have both a high level of employment and a high degree of price stability.

True, this is now the official party line. Even the President has recently said as much. But this was not so last summer when this questionnaire was sent out. And I suggest that the mere fact that the questionnaire went out caused the big financial groups to reappraise their position on this issue. I suggest they were prodded, without waiting to see the economists' answers, to recognize the weakness of the notion that there must always be a large percentage of the labor force for which our economic systems cannot make room—without inflation.

So far as I know, the American Bankers Association was the first to shift to the new line. On October 7 of last year the Economic Policy Commission of the ABA issued a policy statement announcing the new line. And it condemned as "defeatist" those who might wish to cling to the older, contrary line. It said:

> Some hold that we are faced with a Hobson's choice between maximum employment and price-level stability—that we cannot have one without sacrificing the other. This is a defeatist view. There is no reason to assume that these two objectives are basically incompatible. There is no conflict between them unless "maximum employment" is defined as synonymous with continuous brimful employment, supported by governmental policies aimed at eliminating even minor fluctuations in output and employment.

Now I do not mean to suggest that this shift in propaganda line reflects any real shift in policy. On the contrary, the policy is the same. This ABA statement still demanded that the Employment Act of 1946 be amended, and for the purpose of providing the mandate which I have mentioned. The statement said that the amendment "would strengthen the hands of those in our Government and in the Federal Reserve System who are trying to help keep our economy sound."

But at least this much has been accomplished: The country is no longer being told that we must choose between full employment and galloping inflation. A boom which would eliminate the so-called frictional unemployment, yes, it is agreed that would be highly inflationary without Government controls. But the emphasis now is on how compatible the objectives of high employment and stable prices really are. So at least the big issue has been dressed in a different argument, and this may have considerable effect on how the issue is resolved.

THE CRITIC MISREPRESENTS ECONOMISTS' VIEWS

I come now to one of the most serious misimpressions of the economists' views created by the address of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS]. Here is his statement which I submit creates an impression that an overwhelming majority of the economists are clamoring for an unemployment ratio of 5 percent or more as a "condition for achieving a high degree of price stability":

> Exactly 36 percent said they would accept an unemployment ratio, and this was a surprising thing, an unemployment ratio between 5 and 7 percent as a condition for achieving a high degree of price stability. Thirty percent would insist on a lower ratio; the remainder would allow the ratio to go even above 7 percent.

Yet in reality the views expressed by these economists were just the opposite of the impressions which that statement conveys. There are several things wrong with the statement.

First, the gentleman neglected to mention that the economists who were invited to answer this question were those who had answered "yes" to the previous question. And the previous question was: "Do you believe it feasible to achieve simultaneously both relatively high employment and relatively high stability of the general price level?"

In other words, these economists were asked how high a ratio of unemployment they would accept "if necessary" to achieve relatively high stability of prices, despite the fact that in their answers to the previous question they indicated they do not think any high unemployment ratio is necessary. This is quite different from the impression given that these economists are practically clamoring for these unemployment ratios.

A second thing that is wrong with my colleague's statement is this: He accounted for 30 percent of the economists as those who would insist on an unemployment ratio of less than 5 percent; he accounted for another 36 percent as those who would accept a ratio between 5 and 7 percent; and then he stated "the remainder would allow the ratio to go even above 7 percent."

Yet clearly the remainder, which is 33 percent, did not indicate they would accept an unemployment ratio of above 7 percent. My colleague reached this conclusion only by adding into this group the 24.4 percent shown in the table on page 3 of the report as making no response to the question whatever. We cannot, I think, merely assume that these 24 percent of the economists who did not answer the question about unemployment ratios would have said, if they had answered, that they "would allow the ratio to go even above 7 percent." There is no basis for such an assumption.

Obviously, when we look at what the questions and answers show, rather than the highly misleading inference my colleague has drawn, the basis for his great surprise at how conservative these answers are tends to disappear.

Incidentally, exactly 36 percent did not say they would accept an unemployment ratio between 5 and 7 percent—if necessary. The exact figure is 34.5 percent and it is arrived at by consolidating answers shown in the report which give a less conservative picture if left unconsolidated. Actually, 24.6 percent indicated they would not accept unemployment as high as 6 percent—if such were a necessary condition to achieving a relatively high degree of price stability. Only 9.9 percent said they would accept a ratio of between 6 and 7 percent. And only 11 percent said they would accept higher ratios—if necessary.

I assume that my colleague's manhandling of the economists' views on unemployment was inadvertent. I do point out, however, that he has created misimpressions which could have quite serious practical consequences. They are in the main stream of the big propaganda drive of the day. And these misimpressions go to the basic ideological difference between his political party and mine. They make propaganda for the central policy being urged by big business and by finance, and it is this policy that forms the battleground over which real and pending economic issues are being fought.

In contrast, my statistical error overstates the number of economists who think banking facilities can be improved, and this is a relatively academic issue. There is no serious proposal to overhaul the private banking system, and no big legislative decisions or Presidential vetoes are likely to be influenced by what has been said on this subject.

THE CRITIC'S CHARGE THAT ECONOMISTS ON UNIVERSITY FACULTIES ARE BIASED

I come now to my colleague's charge that the academic economists are biased. His statement was:

> In view of the characteristic bias of many of our good academic economists in favor of maximum employment at any cost, it is really remarkable that this survey turned up as conservative an overall response as it did. In fact, it was quite conservative.

As an aside, it is interesting to note here that the term "conservative" in my colleague's book means views that agree with the big-business party line, while the word "bias" means views which do not. Furthermore, I have already dealt with one of the statements which the gentleman found so surprisingly conservative. It turns out not to be so conservative when we look to see what the economists actually did say about unemployment ratios, rather than at what he thought they said.

Actually, there is no foundation whatever for charging that the academic economists are biased in favor of maximum employment at any cost. Furthermore, the only cost which has been suggested for maximum employment is that of inflation. And as I have pointed out, 73 percent of the economists who returned the questionnaire said they believed it feasible to have both high levels of employment and a high degree of price stability. So there is hardly any room for them to be biased in favor of maximum employment at any cost when they have already said they do not believe there is any significant cost.

THE CRITIC MADE NEW STATISTICAL ERRORS

Let me come now to the error in my press release and the greater error which my colleague substituted for it. This release stated that nearly two-thirds of these economists "indicated that they felt there were important inadequacies in the banking facilities of the country, growing out of the tendency of bankers to content themselves with holding riskless assets in the form of Government and Government-guaranteed bonds and loans at ever higher interest rates rather than to function as vigorous and enterprising suppliers of funds to business by meeting local banking needs."

In the context in which this statement was made the reader could assume that nearly two-thirds of these economists referred to two-thirds of all the 615 economists who returned the questionnaire had indicated that there are inadequacies for the reasons I cited. My colleague correctly pointed out that nearly two-thirds of all the economists who returned the questionnaire did not say this.

Actually, this was said by nearly two-thirds—64.9 percent—of only those economists who responded to the questions as to whether or not there are local or regional inadequacies in any of the several respects about which questions were asked.

However, at this point my colleague asserted that the correct number of economists who had said banking facilities are inadequate for the reason I cited "is less than two-thirds of about one-fifty, of two-fifteenths, which is a very small group."

If it were only two-fifteenths of all the economists who returned the questionnaire, this would be only 81 economists. Yet, the second table on page 8 of the report plainly shows that 200 economists answered that banking facilities are inadequate locally or regionally for the reason I cited, namely, that the bankers tend to hold riskless Government securities. And these 200 economists accounted for 64.9 percent of all of the 308 economists who responded to any of these questions one way or the other. We may assume, I think, that the economists who did not answer either "yes" or "no" to these questions felt that they were probably not able to give a competent opinion.

So a more accurate statement would be this: Approximately one-half of the economists who returned the questionnaire—308 of the 615—answered either "yes" or "no" to one or more of the questions concerning local or regional inadequacies in banking facilities; and of these 308 economists nearly two-thirds—64.9 percent—said there were inadequacies for the particular reason stated in my press release.

I would interpret these facts to mean this: Of those economists who felt they could give a competent judgment on the adequacy of local or regional banking facilities, nearly two-thirds said these facilities are inadequate for the reason I stated. And a large number of economists, 308, apparently did feel competent to express a judgment on this subject.

Thus, while there was a technical inaccuracy in my press release, it does not seem to me that the press release conveys a very misleading impression. Certainly the correct figures do not support my colleague's statement that:

> So just the reverse was true as the result of this question as sent out—just the reverse of what the gentleman from Texas said in his press release.

So, contrary to my colleague's argument, perhaps debate on the floor of the House is not the best way to try to work out statistical computations after all.

THE ECONOMISTS' ANSWER TO ALL QUESTIONS ARE SALIENT

While my colleague conceded no value to the economists' answers to the committee's questionnaire, he nevertheless picked and chose among their answers and presented in his statement those answers which he considered to be the salient findings. I suggest that the answers to all the questions are salient; and I strongly invite the Members' attention to the committee's full report which, being brief, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

Now a closing observation about my colleague's disdain for "the proclamations of thunderous majorities."

Herbert Spencer said, in his First Principles, that:

> The fact disclosed by a survey of the past that majorities have been wrong must not blind us to the complementary fact that majorities have usually not been entirely wrong.

TABULATION OF REPLIES SUBMITTED TO THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC STABILIZATION OF THE JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE, CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

The Joint Economic Committee through its Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization has, by questionnaire, secured the professional views of economic experts at colleges and universities on a number of questions of current economic policy. These were designed to cover not only key issues related to stabilization, but also certain related banking questions.

The economic policy questionnaire was mailed on September 10, 1958, and replies received through October 31 were tabulated.

The questionnaire was distributed in the first instance by sending a supply of forms to the heads of economics departments in 150 institutions granting higher degrees in economics, with the request that the questionnaire be distributed to individual faculty members of the respective departments. The list of institutions canvassed was compiled from data published by the Office of Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; all the 49 States, the District of Columbia, and Hawaii were represented.

The coverage of the inquiry and its results is evidenced by the number and geographical distribution of the responses received. By the closing date, 615 completed questionnaires had been returned from all parts of the Nation. These constituted about 40 percent of the number of economists that it is estimated were reached through department heads.

The committee recognizes the difficulties of answering economic policy questions categorically. As a matter of practicality, however, the questions were nevertheless put in multiple-choice form, so that a minimum of time would be required of the individual respondents and summarization of the results would be facilitated. In addition to the direct answers which lent themselves to tabulation, many respondents accepted the subcommittee's invitation to make qualifying and amplifying statements.

In general, the answers have been tabulated as marked, with note taken of the comments and reservations. Comments have not been treated as affecting the answer unless, as in a few cases, the qualifications seemed to invalidate or contradict the answer indicated in the multiple-choice boxes.

The letters sent to departmental chairmen, the questionnaire itself, and a list of the universities contacted are reproduced in the appendix.

The committee is appreciative of the public spirit of the economists who gave time and effort to this study. It is, of course, understood that views summarized in the tabulations are those of the responding economists and do not necessarily reflect the views of the subcommittee or its individual members.

TABULATION OF REPLIES TO ECONOMIC POLICY QUESTIONNAIRES [1]

1. The Employment Act of 1946 contemplates, either explicitly or by implication, several objectives of public policy. Success in the achievement of any of them may on occasion necessitate some sacrifice in attainment of another. Recent discussion has focused on the problem of reconciling maximum employment with maintaining stability of the general price level.

A. Do you believe it feasible to achieve simultaneously both relatively high employment and relatively high stability of the general price level?

	Yes		No		No response		Total
	Number	Percent	Number	Percent	Number	Percent	Number	Percent
In the short run?	369	60.0	222	36.1	24	3.9	615	100.0
In the long run?	450	73.2	151	24.6	14	2.3	615	100.0

If your answer is "Yes," you may wish to indicate the maximum level of unemployment (seasonally adjusted) that you would be prepared to accept, if necessary, as a condition for achieving a high degree of price stability:

Maximum level of unemployment as percent of labor force	Number	Percent
Under 3 percent	18	2.9
3 percent and under 4 percent	77	12.5
4 percent and under 5 percent	92	15.0

11 percent through 20 percent	3	.5
Total responses	465	75.6
No response	150	24.4
Grand total	615	100.0

You may wish also to indicate what in your judgment constitutes a satisfactorily "high degree of price stability":

Maximum yearly price change	Number	Percent
Under 1 percent	26	4.2
1 percent and under 2 percent	82	13.3
2 percent and under 3 percent	74	12.0
3 percent	48	7.8

5 percent	20	3.3
6 percent through 10 percent	12	2.0
Total responses	274	44.6
No response or not tabulated [1]	341	55.4
Grand total	615	100.0

[1] Includes, in addition to no response, essay-type responses and those relating solely to the long run.

B. If these two objectives are not, in your opinion, fully compatible, please indicate which, over the long run, you believe should be given the greater emphasis:

	Number	Percent
Maximum employment	329	53.5
Price stability	113	18.4
No response	173	28.1
Total	615	100.0

C. Do you believe that standby authority for direct controls should be available in order to assure sustained high employment combined with high stability of the general price level?

	Number	Percent
Yes	413	67.2
No	187	30.4
No response	15	2.4
Total	615	100.0

If your answer is "Yes," please indicate which types of controls you favor—

Of business investment	197	47.7
Of consumer credit	384	93.0
Of prices	182	44.1
Of wages	179	43.3

If your answer is "Yes," do you think that the strengthening of competition (through vigorous antitrust and related policies) could be expected—

2. A. In its anti-inflationary actions of recent years, how would you characterize the Federal Government's use of the following basic policies?

	Too little		Enough		Too much		No response		Total

If you believe, however, that as a general proposition reliance or preference should be placed more heavily on one type of policy than another, please indicate:

SCHOOL SUPPORT ACT OF 1959

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Montana [Mr. METCALF] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include tables, charts, and extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, this year, 1959 is an important centennial year in the history of education.

The year 1859 was crowded with many important events in the history of education. That was the year Charles Darwin's "Origin of Species," one of the greatest scientific books of all time, was published in England. It was the year that the Union Institute, forerunner of Duke University, was established in North Carolina. It was the year of the death of Horace Mann, founder of the American system of free public schools. But, most important it was the year Congress passed a bill sponsored by Senator Justin S. Morrill of Vermont, granting 20,000 acres of public land to each State for every Senator and Representative the State had in Congress. The purpose of the bill was to endow a college of agriculture and mechanic arts in every State. Although this bill was vetoed, a later bill granting 30,000 acres for this purpose was approved and became law in 1862. But it was in 1859 that Congress took the initial action leading to establishment of the land-grant colleges and universities, which have played such an important role in American education.

I hope that the action the Congress takes in 1959 will parallel in importance for the promotion of education the action that the Congress took just a century ago. But even more I hope that the legislation of the Congress in the field of education will not be vetoed this year as it was in 1859.

An opportunity equal to any of the great moments for the advancement of education in the past presents itself to us now. An effort to make the most of this opportunity is embodied in the School Support Act of 1959 which several of my colleagues and I have introduced in this 86th Congress.

In every sense that makes this measure acceptable to the dedicated and thoughtful authorities on education in the United States, the enactment of this bill should make the current year a memorable one in the history of education.

In brief review, here are its principal provisions:

MAIN PROVISION OF H.R. 22

The bill proposes to provide financial assistance for the support of public schools by appropriating funds to the States to be used for constructing school facilities and for teachers' salaries. It declares that Congress finds there is a serious national shortage of classrooms and teachers which requires immediate action on the part of the Federal Government. It authorizes Federal appropriations equal to $25 for each school-age child for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1959; $50 for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960; $75 for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1961; and $100 for each fiscal year thereafter. It directs the U.S. Commissioner of Education to allot to each State complying with the provisions of this act an amount based on the ratio between the school-age population of that State and the school-age population of all such States.

The bill provides that the allotment to any State shall be reduced proportionately whenever the State school effort index falls below the national school effort index. It establishes the formulas for determining the indexes based on the relationship between the expenditures per public-school child and the income per child of school age. This provision is not applicable during the first 3 years of the program.

H.R. 22 provides that grants for school construction or for teachers' salaries shall be based upon certification to the U.S. Commissioner of Education from the State educational agency that the allotment will be distributed among the public school districts and used solely for school construction or for teachers' salaries or for both at the discretion of the State.

The bill prohibits any Federal interference over State school systems.

A full argument for this bill, with supporting facts and figures, would be voluminous. I shall not ask you to hear such an argument from me. Many of the relevant facts are too well known to bear repetition. They have been brought out in committee hearings and remarks on the floor over a period of years. I invite you, however, to consider some of the most recent relevant data and briefly to reconsider some of the basic reasons why Congress should enact this legislation.

SHORTAGE OF CLASSROOMS

On January 28 of this year the Office of Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, released certain factual information having tragic implications for the welfare of this Nation. The Office reported that at the start of the current school year public school enrollment in this country was approximately 1,843,000 or nearly 2 million above the normal classroom capacity of the public schools. This was revealed in reports from the States in the Office of Education's fifth annual survey of public school enrollment, teachers, and school housing.

The number of public school pupils in excess of public school classroom capacity was 5.4 percent of the total enrollment last fall. The District of Columbia and 18 States reported an increase in excess of enrollment over classroom capacity since the fall of 1957.

Altogether the States reported a need for 140,500 additional instruction rooms. Of these 65,300 were needed to accommodate the 1,843,000 pupils enrolled in excess of normal capacity and 75,200 to replace facilities considered obsolete or otherwise unsatisfactory.

The most important figures which the Office of Education's report includes are those which show that, despite an almost unbelievable effort on the part of the States and localities, the problem is not only getting no better, but shows indications of worsening. Last year a record number of classrooms was completed, a total of 71,600. Yet, the classroom shortage was reduced by only slightly over 1 percent. This year, the anticipated total construction is only 68,000, while the need—due to increased new enrollment and larger numbers of abandoned classrooms—will be even greater. This means that rather than a slight reduction in the backlog of needed classrooms, this year will probably bring about an increase.

These findings must be considered conservative. The information upon which the Office of Education based its report was gathered before the disastrous Chicago fire. As a result of that fire, school districts all over America are inspecting the schools and condemning hundreds of additional classrooms as unsafe and school buildings as fire traps.

Tens of thousands of school children in America are attending school in classrooms that are obsolete, that are firetraps, unsafe, and makeshift. The figures show that the widespread idea that this Nation provides equal educational opportunities for all its children is only a myth.

SHORTAGE OF TEACHERS

The aforementioned report by the U.S. Office of Education also gave data on the number of teachers teaching on substandard credentials in the United States in the fall of 1958. These figures tell the story of the Nation's failure to offer financial and other rewards for teaching sufficient to keep in our schools enough people who can meet even the minimum requirements for licenses to teach. The result is a sordid picture of desperate employment by school boards of tens of thousands of persons to teach in our schools on emergency, substandard certificates. Last fall there were 92,337 persons teaching in our schools on substandard certificates—68,156 in elementary schools and 24,181 in secondary schools.

I do not need to explain to any thinking person what this means for public education in the United States, at a time when we are engaged in a life-or-death competition with the Soviet Union, the outcome of which will depend upon education.

I do not need to point out to you, either, that the main reason that we, as a Nation, do not have nearly enough well-qualified teachers in our schools is that we do not pay teachers enough. As a result, because we as a people have a distorted sense of values, measuring everything according to dollars, teachers in the United States do not generally have the high social prestige which should accompany the importance of their work in our society. Because their prestige is lower than it should be, teachers often do not receive the respect due them from their pupils. The result is a grave disciplinary problem. This adds to the other burdens the teachers of our time are obliged to bear. No wonder so many of them are leaving the profession. The vicious circle is completed to the detriment of education in America.

The contrast between the income of the American teachers and the incomes in other fields is a striking one. It is especially striking and particularly pertinent, for example, in the field of entertainment. For both the teacher and the entertainer seek the attention and the interest of audiences made up in no small part of American youth. Generally we pay teachers a ridiculous fraction of the pay accorded to baseball players and actors. If we thus debase the teaching profession by according it little pay and no respect, and persist in keeping its standards low, how can we expect to meet on the educational level the challenge and the competition being directed at us—in these very fields—by the Soviet Union? We may well ask ourselves: Which is more important, the evanescent pleasures of entertainment or the education of America's children?

Yet our survival as a Nation and the survival of the free world hangs in the balance.

WHAT THE RUSSIANS ARE DOING

We have recently obtained from some of our most prominent American citizens, and from other respectable sources, considerable information concerning what the Russians are doing in public education. It all sums up to a complete dedication to education by the Government and the people of the U.S.S.R.

We know that teachers in the Soviet Union occupy a position of relatively high income, high respect and social prestige, and many special privileges. We know that a good many college professors in the Soviet Union receive salaries comparable to those of American corporation presidents. We know that the Soviet Government is devoting a large percentage of its budget to education. We know a lot of other things about Soviet education that might well cause us to stop and think.

Furthermore we have observed with astonishment some of the results of the Russian commitment to education. We have heard testimony, for example, that there are numerous Russians in other countries who can speak the languages of those countries, as well as our own, but that there are relatively few Americans in other countries who can speak the languages of those countries, and Russian. The startling Russian advances toward the conquest of space are too well known to require comment.

What is the significance of this for America? An answer has been given by former U.S. Senator William Benton, who said several years ago:

A recent trip to the U.S.S.R. has convinced me that education has become a main feature of the cold war; that Russia's classrooms and libraries, her laboratories and teaching methods may threaten us more than her hydrogen bombs. * * *

The Communists from the earliest days gave up butter for guns, but they gave up meat for education. (School and Society, May 26, 1956, p. 175.)

This statement by Mr. Benton can scarcely be quoted too often nor thought about too much in America. Neither can the recent statement made by the U.S. Commissioner of Education following the return of a group of American educators from a visit to the Soviet Union, namely:

Everywhere we went we saw indication after indication of what we could only conclude amounted to a total commitment to education (in the U.S.S.R.). (Address before the National Press Club in Washington, June 13, 1958.)

STATISTICS BY STATES

I offer for inclusion in the RECORD at this point a table showing full 1958 statistics on enrollment, teachers, and schoolhousing in full-time public elementary and secondary day schools, by States. The table was prepared in the Educational Statistics Branch of the U.S. Office of Education. From it anyone can gather significant information on how his own State falls short in provision for public elementary and secondary education:

What this might mean to us was partly expressed in 1955 by Chairman Lewis L. Strauss of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission who said that:

> If there is to be another (shooting) war among the great nations of the world before the human race discovers a method of abolishing resort to combat, that war may be survived by the country with the greatest stockpile of nuclear weapons and instruments of their delivery. But such a war will almost certainly be lost by the country with the fewest resources in trained manpower. (Aircraft Industries Association, Planes, January 1955.)

America must have trained manpower in all fields. Our whole national citizenry must be prepared, through education, for peaceful competition or for war if—God forbid—it should ever be forced upon us. Addressing the National Education Association 2 years ago, President Eisenhower declared that:

> Our schools are strong points in our national defense. Our schools are more important than our Nike batteries, more necessary than our radar warning nets, and more powerful even than the energy of the atom.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S PROPOSAL

In spite of this astute observation by President Eisenhower, he has offered the present Congress only a feeble and ineffectual proposal for Federal action for the advancement of education in the United States.

The administration's plan, made public on February 9 of this year by Secretary Flemming of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, has met with adverse criticism even from prominent members of the Republican Party. For example, Senator COOPER, top Republican on the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, said that he would introduce the administration's bills but he does not believe Mr. Eisenhower's proposals will meet the needs for elementary school construction.

Senator MURRAY, chairman of the Senate subcommittee considering school aid bills, has said that he considers the program a legislative monstrosity and that it appears to be designed not to help education but to help bankers. I heartily agree with Senator MURRAY'S opinion although I question whether it would even be of help to the bankers.

The administration's proposal is described as a sound fiscal approach to the school construction problem in the United States. An analysis of this proposal shows that it is neither a fiscally sound nor an appreciable help to the school districts of this country which are struggling against overwhelming odds to deal with the great educational crisis which is facing us.

In summary, what this bill provides is the underwriting of school bonds—the interest and principal payments—with the credit of the U.S. Government. "Underwriting" is used here in a similar manner to the way in which you as an individual "underwrite" the repayment of a loan made to a friend of yours when you agree to cosign a note of his at the bank. In other words, it is the same principle as that applied to the veterans housing program which was extended by legislation recently adopted in this House.

Payments would not be made from the funds established under this proposal unless there was a finding that the district had made a "reasonable tax effort." "Reasonable tax effort" is, however, left undefined. The proposal would authorize appropriations of $300 million for each of the next 5 fiscal years to be used as a Federal debt service obligation fund. These funds would be distributed among the States on the basis of a complicated formula which takes into account: (a) the number of pupils enrolled in the public schools of the State, (b) the need of the schools in the State, and (c) the relative degree of effort which the State's school districts are making to meet their classroom shortage.

In order to qualify for the amount of "underwriting" which the formula would allow, the State would have to submit a State plan which would detail the way in which these funds would be distributed to the various school districts in the State, guarantee a continued "reasonable tax effort" from all districts participating, and provide for State participation in an amount equal to that provided by the Federal Government.

The element of "fiscal responsibility" which this plan claims to present, is found in the fact that there will be no money spent in this fiscal year—except for administrative expenses, which, incidentally, run quite high. Expenditures—if, indeed, they may ever be substantial—will come in future years. President Eisenhower's budget will not be thrown out of balance, but those of future administrations might be. It appears that the President is not so strongly opposed to "deficit financing" as long as it is "deferred deficit financing."

A major problem is the legal impediments which would limit the number of districts which could participate in the program. Many districts have already reached constitutional or statutory limitations on bonded indebtedness. Underwriting any future bond issues would be of no help to them. There is no way they can go further in debt without action which is very difficult to obtain.

At this point, I would like to introduce a tabulation which gives some indication of the extent of this problem:

PERCENTAGE OF DISTRICTS BY STATE WHICH HAVE REACHED LEGAL INDEBTEDNESS OR MILLAGE LIMITS AS OF APRIL 1958

Alabama, 80 percent.
Alaska, no figures available.
Arizona, no figures available.
Arkansas, 29 percent.
California, 22 percent enrolling approximately 30 percent of all pupils.
Colorado, no figures available.
Connecticut, no figures available.
Delaware, less than 1 percent.
Florida, 70 percent.
Georgia, 17 percent.
Idaho, 14 percent.
Illinois, 2 percent.
Indiana, no figures available.
Iowa, less than 10 percent.
Kansas, no figures available.
Kentucky, 27 percent enrolling approximately two-thirds of all pupils.
Louisiana, between 7 and 12 percent.
Maine, 40 percent.
Maryland, no figures available.
Massachusetts, no figures available.
Michigan, no legal maximum (15 percent are at practical limit).
Minnesota, 12 percent.
Mississippi, less than 10 percent.
Missouri, 12½ percent.
Montana, no figures available.
Nebraska, no districts at maximum.
Nevada, almost 100 percent.
New Hampshire, 15 percent.
New Jersey, 50 percent.
New Mexico, 100 percent.
New York, no districts at maximum.
North Carolina, no districts at maximum.
North Dakota, 2 percent of total; 15 percent of town districts (which have greatest need).
Ohio, 10 percent.
Oklahoma, 14 percent.
Oregon, 10 percent.
Pennsylvania, 75 to 80 percent.
Rhode Island, 82 percent.
South Carolina, no figures available.
South Dakota, 20 percent.
Tennessee, 56 percent.
Texas, 30 percent.
Utah, no figures available.
Vermont, no districts at maximum.
Virginia, no limitation for counties; 50 percent of cities have reached maximum.
Washington, 19 percent of districts enrolling 70 percent of pupils.
West Virginia, 42 percent.
Wisconsin, less than 1 percent.
Wyoming, 12 districts enrolling about 20 percent of the pupils.

From these figures it can be seen that more than half the districts in 7 States could not—under existing State laws—participate in this program; that a substantial portion of the districts could not do so in another 17 States; and that at least some districts could not participate in another 7. Of the remaining States, seven show no disability, and we do not have information regarding the rest.

The percentage of districts in the various States which have reached the maximum debt limit is not adequate to describe the problem, however, because the districts which have reached their maximum are those which are probably in the worst need, as well as being the districts which have shown the greatest willingness to try to solve their own problem.

It seems to be possible that this limited aid would be of no help even to those districts which had not reached debt limitations. In order to qualify for any aid in repayment of their indebtedness they would have to be declared incapable of meeting their financial obligations, or their proposed financial obligations. It is quite probable that in most States it would be impossible for a district to contract a bonded indebtedness upon which there had been a definite finding of this nature by a State agency. Certainly, any such procedure would bring about costly and time-consuming taxpayers' suits challenging the legality of such action.

Even if it were assumed that the legal difficulties just discussed could be overcome, there is still the problem of the States' constitutional authority to participate in the ways this proposal would require. The administration's proposal envisions three methods of State participation: First, State grants to school districts in equal amounts to the Federal guarantees; second, State loans in these amounts; or third, State guarantees equal to those of the Federal Government. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare admits that referendums or constitutional amendments would be necessary in many States in order for the last method to be used because of the inability of many States to incur debt. Such State actions might also be necessary in the other cases due to the financial conditions of the State governments. Under current conditions, most States would be unable to raise the amounts of money which would be required without deficit financing, and, thus, the same problems would be raised as under the guarantee method.

At this point, I introduce a tabulation showing the relative provisions in the 49 States:

ABILITY OF STATES TO INCUR BONDED DEBT PROVISIONS WHICH WOULD HAVE TO BE MET

Alabama: Constitutional amendment.

Arizona: Constitutional amendment (vote limited to real property taxpayers).

Arkansas: Referendum.

California: Referendum for general indebtedness, legislature may borrow up to $300,000.

Colorado: Constitutional amendment.

Connecticut: No provisions regarding indebtedness.

Delaware: Legislature may borrow with three-fourths vote of both houses.

Florida: Constitutional amendment.

Georgia: Constitutional amendment.

Idaho: Legislature may borrow $2 million; all other requires referendum (including tax for payment of interest and principal).

Illinois: Referendum (including tax for payment for interest).

Indiana: Constitutional amendment.

Iowa: Referendum (including tax for payment of interest and principal).

Kansas: Legislature may borrow $1 million. All other must be approved by referendum (including tax to pay interest and principal).

Kentucky: Referendum (including tax to pay for interest and principal).

Louisiana: Constitutional amendment.

Maine: Constitutional amendment for authorization by the electorate; legislature may borrow for most purposes.

Maryland: No real limit on legislature.

Massachusetts: Legislature may borrow with two-thirds vote of both houses.

Michigan: Constitutional amendment (vote limited to property taxpayers and spouses).

Minnesota: Constitutional amendment.

Mississippi: No provisions regarding indebtedness.

Missouri: Referendum, except in special cases.

Montana: Legislature may borrow up to $100,000. Others require referendum (including tax to pay for interest and principal).

Nebraska: Constitutional amendment.

Nevada: Legislature may borrow up to 1 percent assessed value of property; all other requires constitutional amendment.

New Hampshire: No provisions regarding indebtedness.

New Jersey: Legislature may borrow up to $100,000. Other requires referendum (including tax to pay interest and principal).

New Mexico: Referendum—limited to 1 percent of assessed valuation (including tax to pay for interest and principal).

New York: Referendum, and approval of legislature.

North Carolina: Constitutional amendment.

North Dakota: Legislature may borrow up to $100,000. All others require constitutional amendment.

Ohio: Constitutional amendment.

Oklahoma: Referendum (including tax for interest and principal).

Oregon: Legislature may borrow up to 13 percent of assessed valuation for specified purposes.

Pennsylvania: Constitutional amendment.

Rhode Island: Legislature may borrow up to $50,000. All other requires referendum.

South Carolina: Referendum—two-thirds majority (including tax to pay interest and principal).

South Dakota: Legislature may borrow up to one-half of 1 percent with a two-thirds vote.

Tennessee: No provisions for indebtedness.

Texas: Constitutional amendment.

Utah: Legislature may borrow 1½ percent assessed property valuation.

Vermont: No provisions.

Virginia: Referendum—limited to 1 percent of assessed valuation.

Washington: Referendum (including tax to pay interest and principal).

West Virginia: Constitutional amendment (including tax to pay principal).

Wisconsin: Constitutional amendment.

Wyoming: Legislature may borrow up to the amount of the tax revenues for the current year; all other requires a referendum (limited to 1 percent of the assessed property valuation).

Alaska: Referendum.

NOTE.—If it were assumed that most of the States—given their current financial situations—would have to incur indebtedness in order to participate in this proposed program it can be readily seen that the legal obstacles would be great. If the amount to be borrowed were large at all, 17 States would have to pass constitutional amendments; referendums would be required in 18 States; the legislatures of 9 States could handle the problem with varying degrees of difficulty; and there is no information as yet obtained on 5 States.

If the States which require constitutional amendments or referendums were placed with the State of South Dakota, which places extremely strict limitations on the legislature in its borrowing power, into a category which might be called "States Facing High Legal Barriers Against Raising Money for Matching Requirements" the States so included would contain about 110,000 of the 140,500 classrooms presently needed.

If, despite the many problems which have already been raised, this Congress decided to go ahead with such a program, and the States agreed to undertake the changes in their fundamental law which would be required, there is still the question of how much aid this program would provide. It is probable that those States which would have to change constitutional requirements could not participate for at least 3 years, because of the time necessary to accomplish the amendments. As an example, my State would have to have such an amendment. We have a biennial legislative session, and by the time this proposal could go into effect, there would be no opportunity for initiation of the amendment at this session. This means that the earliest such legislation could be passed would be in the 1961 session. Then the proposed amendment would have to be submitted to the voters at the next general election—November 1962. If all these procedures were followed, the State of Montana would then be able to participate in 2 of the 5 years of the program, and it would receive a potential allocation of $4 million of U.S. credit, provided it could put up an equal amount. Some of this money might eventually find its way into funds for school construction, although the problems mentioned above make that possibility seem unlikely.

Certainly the situation in Montana is similar to that in many other States.

But for the sake of argument, assume that some few districts in the United States do qualify for this proposed aid. Experts in the municipal bond field have informed me that the administration's proposal could be a very disruptive influence in the field of school finance. Those bonds backed by a Federal and State guarantee which were offered for sale would be much more attractive to prospective investors than would those which are not so favored. In a normal market—which contains only so much money for investment in this type of security—an influx of such "guaranteed" bonds would have a tendency to drive up the interest rate of the bonds issued by the unaided districts. Indeed, those districts which did not meet the "need" and "effort" criteria established by the State, but which were having financial difficulty, might find it extremely difficult to market their bonds at all.

A last criticism of the administration's bill—and a very important one—is that it does nothing to alleviate the problem of inadequate teachers' salaries, despite the fact that the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare has stated on many occasions that these should be at least doubled. Perhaps it is just as well that the bill does not go into this subject, in view of what it has recommended for school construction. If the administration undertook to improve teachers' salaries in the same manner that they have moved to meet the classroom shortage, it would probably bring about a lowering of their salaries rather than an increase.

The administration's proposal, if enacted, would establish another Federal bureaucracy, and this would be one of the worst sort, having power to establish various petty restrictions and stipulations respecting school-construction loans that would be harassing to State and local school officials. The Eisenhower proposal is not only utterly inadequate; it sidesteps the problem which should be met head on.

THE FEDERAL CONTROL BUGABOO

The crisis in education in the United States is real. It is probably the most crucial problem facing our country today. This is no time for us to allow ourselves to be frightened by the bogey man of "Federal control over education." This bogey man has been used too long by selfish interest groups to conceal their real reasons for opposing Federal participation in financing education. We know that their real reason for opposing it has generally been the unwillingness of big corporations to pay a fairer share of the taxes—Federal taxes—needed to support education. Other real reasons for opposing further Federal participation in financing education have included, first, an unwillingness or inability to see educational problems as being national in scope; and second, a refusal or inability to recognize public education as being a primary—perhaps the primary—public responsibility.

Federal control over education through Federal participation in financing it has not developed in the nearly two centuries of such Federal aid, which began with grants of land for this purpose. However, in recent years the Congress has not lived up to its declaration in the famous ordinance of 1787 that "Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged."

The talk about Federal control of education in recent years, insofar as Federal financial aid is concerned, has referred not to actual Federal control that has ever developed, but to the supposed possibility of future Federal control. Yet practically all of the bills introduced have contained safeguards against Federal control, as does my present bill, H.R. 22. The idea, which some people would still have us believe, that the Congress cannot enact such legislation without opening an avenue of Federal control over education is about the sheerest nonsense I have ever heard.

A NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

The times demand our reexamination of the entire role of the Federal Government in education. I agree with the recent statement by Secretary Flemming of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, that there is a grave need for agreement on national goals for education, as well as agreement on a fair share of responsibility of Government at all levels, for the support of education.[4] However, while we are seeking an agreement on such comprehensive and long-range matters we must enact legislation to meet immediate needs. I believe that enactment of H.R. 22 would go a long way toward meeting such needs.

It is clear that the Federal Government inherently bears a large share of the responsibility for financing public education, even though the States and localities have traditionally borne most of the cost. We cannot hope to preserve our form of government unless all of our people are educationally equipped to understand its basic principles and their application to current problems. The outcome of our life or death competition with the Soviet Union will depend upon the capacities of our whole people. Their abilities will depend in turn upon the provisions for their education.

Under the Constitution the Federal Government is responsible for the national defense and has a duty to promote the general welfare. It cannot discharge these obligations without giving greater aid to the States and localities for school construction and teachers' salaries.

SOME IMPORTANT FACTS

The National Education Association has just released a pamphlet—"Can America Afford Better Schools?" February 1959—which is abundant in factual statements, graphic representations, and tabulations that sum up, in my opinion, to a conclusive argument for enactment of H.R. 22. I will summarize these facts for you, interjecting observations of my own.

The American standard of living is high. Many of us individually buy not only what we actually need but many things we merely want in addition—such as the latest model car or television set, or new clothes each season. As a group we are finding money for better highways, subsidies to industry and agriculture, and more and improved weapons for war. But we need to find money for increasing support for education. By increasing national productivity through more and better education, we will make still more money available for our growing wants. In addition we will establish a safeguard for peace. It is obviously through the maximum development of all of America's human resources that our strength can be made a greater deterrent to war. Increased and better endowed education will not only contribute to our strength but will serve at the same time as a sound basis for the development of understanding and friendship between ourselves and other peoples, through international educational exchanges.

Despite higher taxes, consumer expenditures in the United States have been going up $11.8 billion a year since 1948. In the 10 years since then we have spent $110 billion for new automobiles and $151 billion for tobacco, alcoholic beverages, and cosmetics, but we have spent only $78 billion for public elementary and secondary schools.

The facts show that the Nation can afford to spend a great deal more for public schools. Between 1948 and 1957 our gross national product—the value of all goods and services—increased 70 percent; our national income—the aggregate earnings of labor and property—increased 63 percent; per capita disposable personal income after taxes increased 38 percent; and personal savings increased 88 percent.

Now let us take a look at the sources of support for public education. In some States local taxes on real estate carry most of the load. In other States it is borne mainly by State taxes—personal and corporate income, tobacco, and various indirect taxes.

In some States local support can be increased by raising real estate taxes. In other States property taxes are already very high and taxpayer resistance is growing.

Some States can increase their taxes for education and other functions, but other States are already taxing everything from soft drinks to electric meters.

How do the several levels of Government in the United States share the total bill for public elementary and secondary schools? Local governments pay 56 percent and State governments pay 40 percent, while the Federal Government pays only 4 percent of the total cost. However, education's share of all taxes, local, State, and Federal, is less than it was 50 years ago.

In recent years, local and State debt has been increasing faster than Federal debt. The Federal debt has gone up only 10 percent since 1948, whereas local and State debt has increased 182 percent since 1948.

Uncle Sam is our biggest tax collector. The Federal Government collects and spends almost 3 out of every 4 tax dollars.

It is obvious that the Federal Government has not assumed a reasonable share of school costs and must assume a much larger share if the educational needs of the Nation's children are to be met. Many of the States and localities are fully utilizing their tax resources. The Federal Government must return to the States some of the revenue which it collects on a national scale, for use in the field of education.

Unless the Federal Government puts its shoulder to the educational wheel the American people can expect: First, larger and larger classes in most localities; second, half-day schooling for additional thousands of the Nation's children; third, lower teachers' salaries and loss of competent teachers from schools; fourth, greater shortages of trained manpower; fifth, social, economic, and political deterioration, and sixth, ultimate loss of the brain-power race with other nations.

Within the next 10 years the cost of public education will double, or more than double. There are many reasons for this. The school-age population will continue to increase; cost of facilities and professional services will rise and boys and girls will stay in school longer.

Under our present tax system, a doubling of school costs would mean that thousands of communities would have to increase their real estate taxes by 50 percent to 100 percent. Some States would have to double their sales taxes; others would have to double their income taxes. The people will not endure such tax burdens.

The Federal Government has far greater tax resources and more efficient tax machinery than the State and local governments. It can offset the competition among the States where tax exemption and other devices are used to attract business and industry.

Because of the mobility of population in the United States, with about 15 percent of the school-age population moving from one State to another every 5 years, the quality of education in every State is affected by the quality in others. Yet the Federal Government alone is in a position to help raise the quality of education in all the States.

The children of America are the future citizens of the Nation, not merely of the States and local communities. This fact alone lays upon the Federal Government a heavy share of the responsibility for the schooling of the Nation's youth.

Finally let me remind you that the current brain-power race with the Soviet Union makes education our first line of defense.

I have given you many reasons why, in order to discharge its responsibility for the national defense, and for the promotion of the national welfare, the Federal Government must contribute a much larger share of the cost of elementary and secondary education. H.R. 22 offers a feasible, equitable, and expeditious means of accomplishing this. The fate of the Nation depends upon early enactment by the Congress of such a measure.

IMPORTS OF CATTLE AND DAIRY PRODUCTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BROCK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. Speaker, dutiable cattle imports exceeded 1 million head in the fiscal year 1957–58. This was almost seven times the imports of the previous year and far higher than in any recent 12-months period. Beef and veal imports exceeded $103 million, three times the value imported a year earlier.

The first reaction in reading the above paragraph would cause us to believe that many of these cattle have come in to replenish the herds depleted due to drought but when you examine the statistics of the Department of Agriculture you find that for the fiscal year 1957–58 of 1,054,000 head of cattle imported only 29,000 were for breeding purposes; and 20,000 to improve our dairy herds. The remaining number competed with the ranchers of United States in the stocker and feeder cattle markets.

Imports of eggs exceeded $1 million, six times as many as in the previous 12 months. Disregarding the fact we have a depressed egg market in most of the United States, we continue to import. When I left the farm in late December, other Nebraska farmers and I were receiving 27 cents a dozen for eggs which is much less than cost of production. To my surprise, eggs in the Washington groceries are 75 cents.

The Department of Agriculture has done nothing to curtail these imports and has taken lightly the predictions of our best agriculture economists who foresee a drastic drop in domestic farm prices for live animals beginning in the second quarter of 1959. The 1958 imports of cattle and beef were equal to about 8 percent of domestic production. Taking into account the usual relationships between supplies and prices of beef cattle these imports must have lowered domestic cattle prices 15 percent or more.

Since most of the imports of live cattle come in through a few markets near the Canadian and Mexican borders and often are bunched at particular seasons of the year, national and yearly totals greatly understate the regional disruption in markets caused by these imports. In the seasons when imports are heaviest, local markets in the communities near the Canadian and Mexican borders are especially hard hit.

Imports of all dairy products amounted to about $42 million in both 1956–57 and 1957–58, and since July 1, 1958, imports of livestock and livestock products have continued at the same high rate that they maintained in the first 6 months of the year. Imports of sheep and feeder lambs have been unusually high in recent months. Without doubt when the figures for the calendar year 1958 become available, they will show even larger imports of livestock and livestock products than in the fiscal year 1957–58 which closed on June 30, 1958. These imports too have depressed domestic livestock prices.

My computations indicate nearly 1 billion pounds of red meat imports in 1958, or nearly 4 percent of the total supply, to say nothing of the "on the hoof" imports. The processed red meat imports are at an all time record high, at just about the time when we are going to establish new records with our domestic production. According to the "Foreign Agricultural Outlook Charts," domestic production has declined 9 percent from 1956 through 1958 and foreign imports have increased 60 percent during the same period.

I would say that this situation is inexcusable. The historical comparisons hint strongly that it stems from administration policy, rather than from any legal compulsion of the Mutual Trade Treaty, because of the sharp upturn in 1953 from 1952. We are still importing pork from Poland, and in even greater quantities than in 1955, when our "on the hoof" price went below 10 cents at Sioux City.

I am opposed in principle to buying meat from Poland because it was an ally of Russia and so close to the Iron Curtain. Poland cannot produce enough meat for its own country, let alone export any. This is the real crime of our imports from Poland. You can bet the Polish farmer isn't getting the added income from the American price, but the exporters and the importers are getting it. Possibly our competition has increased it enough in Poland, so the Poles can't afford to buy it. I visualize hungry Polish children standing with their faces pressed to my dining room window, watching me eat their food.

These imports too, are hurting our domestic livestock industry.

The foregoing facts convince me that the Secretary of Agriculture should review the entire program of imports, of livestock and livestock products. He should give consideration to establishing a quota system geared to the demand for such imports in relation to U.S. production.

HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, on last Wednesday, February 18, in the other Chamber a remarkable event occurred which prompts me to make these few brief remarks.

I refer to the unanimous resolution of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee designating my good friend and fellow Rhode Islander, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, as chairman emeritus of that committee. It has been said that there is no precedent among Senate committees for such action.

Mr. Speaker, the full text of the resolution of that committee reads as follows:

Whereas Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island, has been a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations from 1937 to 1947 and from 1949 to date, and served as chairman from January 1957 to January 1959; and

Whereas Senator GREEN has served the people of this Nation by his initiative and hard work in obtaining approval by the Senate of such important foreign policy measures as the Middle East Resolution, the Mutual Security Acts, the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and numerous other measures and treaties important to the peace and security of the United States; and

EXPRESSES APPRECIATION

Whereas in the discharge of his duties Senator GREEN has at every opportunity encouraged the development of a foreign policy rooted in the national interest, has always devoted his full energy and ability to the services of his Nation, and has brought about closer relations between the legislative and executive branches of this Government, and otherwise improved the operations of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and

Whereas Senator GREEN has asked to be relieved as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations expresses its warm affection for Senator GREEN and its deep appreciation for his devotion to duty and for the great service which he has rendered to the committee, to the Senate, and to the United States by his initiative and statesmanship; and be it further

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, in order to continue to benefit by utilizing to the greatest extent possible the experience and knowledge of Senator GREEN, designates him as chairman emeritus of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

We are all familiar with the courageous and patriotic action taken by my distinguished congressional colleague a few weeks ago when he announced his decision to relinquish the chairmanship of that important major committee because of physical infirmities of sight and hearing. In so doing he has made it possible for the chairmanship to be assumed by the distinguished and able Senator from Arkansas, WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, with whom I was proud to serve in this House more than a decade ago.

Senator GREEN's decision was taken, as we know, against the wishes and recommendations of all of his colleagues on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and against the urging of many of his associates in the other body who desired him to carry on. I know that he reached that decision in the recesses of his own heart and mind and he has done that which he believes is the right thing for his country and his party. To me it is an almost unprecedented example of putting service to one's country over one's own personal interest in maintaining power and position.

As so well stated in a special editorial in the Providence Journal on January 31, his action "can only inspire a feeling of profound respect." Mr. Speaker, the entire editorial entitled "Senator GREEN Commands the Nation's Respect" reads as follows:

SENATOR GREEN COMMANDS THE NATION'S RESPECT

The resignation of Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations can only inspire a feeling of profound respect.

A man of 91 who can retain the sense of objectivity and the capacity for self-sacrifice that this action required can truly be said to possess the wisdom of old age. This can be, in its own way, a quality as precious as the vigor and alertness of youth. Rhode Island can be proud to have Mr. GREEN continue his term as its representative in the the U.S. Senate.

Our suggestion that the time had come for the Senator to step down from the foreign relations chairmanship was based on a belief that his great age made his continuation in that vital post, at this time, a handicap to the national interest. This was not an easy suggestion to make, any more than it could have been an easy one for Mr. GREEN to hear. Insofar as it may have helped influence his decision, our reaction is by no means one of gratification, but rather of admiration.

Moreover, the significance of the resignation extends beyond the honor it does Senator GREEN'S personal character. The hope is that the precedent he has set may help to redeem the congressional seniority system itself.

Since there seems no way of changing the system that elevates men to key committee chairmanships solely on the basis of their length of service, the only way to prevent Members from clinging to such posts after the years have robbed them of their capacity to serve effectively is to appeal to their personal patriotism and moral courage. Senator GREEN has set a standard in these respects that may be as valuable to the national interest in the future as his immediate readiness to place the foreign relations chairmanship in the capable hands of Senator FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas.

These newspapers have differed often with THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN throughout his long public career. We will doubtless continue to do so on occasion as long as he holds political office—although recently we have had occasion as often to agree with him. We have tried to respect his integrity and his motives, as we hope he does ours in the position we have taken on the need for the resignation he has now submitted. For our own part, we can sincerely say our respect is increased markedly by his act.

What THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has done, therefore, sets a shining example to all of us in that respect and is one from which we can all profit. In this day and age when so much emphasis and value its placed upon retention of power and influence it is refreshing for a democracy to witness the chairman of one of its most powerful and noted legislative committees stand aside for purely patriotic motives.

But let us not conclude that the services of Senator GREEN as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee will be diminished in any substantial respect. In my opinion they will be enhanced by this action.

Since first coming to Washington in 1941 as a Member of the Rhode Island congressional delegation, I have had the fortunate opportunity of coming to know those rare talents of mind and heart which THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN possesses—qualities which this country so deeply needs and which we are fortunate to have in our service in times of peace and war.

During these years I have developed the highest regard for Senator GREEN not only as a learned statesman but also as a personal counselor and adviser to me on those occasions when I have needed the benefit of his wise experience.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN comes from a rugged New England pioneering family which has given to this Nation several Senators and several Members of this House.

It is in keeping with the tradition of this great Rhode Island family to do that which is unexpected or difficult but nevertheless that which is right.

As a dynamic and thoroughly courageous governor of the State of Rhode Island, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN was a fearless champion of democratic rights. This is the man who battled for basic social reforms—for social justice—when to do so was not the most popular thing to do. But he carried many of them into effect in our native State as Governor and later as a Senator helped to implement them in our Federal legislative system.

I shall never forget that this is the man who withstood the whiplash of organized criticism when he instituted a sweeping judicial reform in the State of Rhode Island which gave us a bipartisan Supreme Court for the first time since the Civil War. Who can forget that this brave and just action an his part is said to have caused the publisher of the Chicago Tribune to cut a star from the flag at the top of the Tribune Building in Chicago and to issue an order that the name or picture of Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN would never again appear in his publication.

So I know the measure of the man and know the cool, temperate but firm review which he made of this recent matter and which led him to take this eventful step. Therefore, I can say that I was not surprised at his decision.

I am happy to know that Senator GREEN will carry on his duties as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and other committees of the Senate. Whatever the disabilities of sight or hearing, let there be no mistake about his capacity to carry on the onerous duties of government. I have personal knowledge, as I am sure many of you do, of his keen and ready wit, his athletic stamina, his extensive fund of knowledge, all of which combine to make him a rare man, indeed.

His education both in the universities of this country and abroad, as well as his long experience in both executive and legislative offices, are assets which the Federal Government is, indeed, fortunate to be able to utilize.

Both you and I know of examples over the years of men in high Government positions who have refrained from the relinquishment of power and position for far more serious and impeding physical disabilities. There is no reason to detail them. Some have existed in the various Cabinets of the Chief Exceutive as well as in the legislative and judicial branches of government.

So what THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has done is all the more remarkable and will be long remembered. It ought not go unnoticed and I am sure it will not by all of us. It is in this sense and this sense only that I make these few brief remarks.

I believe we can appropriately say of my distinguished colleague and dear friend, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, what Oliver Wendell Holmes said of Daniel Webster—

> Thy heart shall own,
> A nation's homage
> Nobler than its throne.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND].

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleague from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] in this tribute to a great American.

Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, the senior Senator from Rhode Island, has once again, by his recent action, given us an example of his greatness, of his patriotism, and of his love for America. He did what few, if any, Members of Congress have ever done—step down voluntarily from the chairmanship of a great committee.

He relinquished the chairmanship of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee because he felt that his impaired sight and hearing made it impossible for him to discharge the duties of that high office as he felt it should be done.

I have known Senator GREEN intimately for more than a half century. I served under him while he was Governor of our State and we were both elected to Congress for the first time, on the same ticket, in 1936, he to the Senate and I to the House. I cherish the fact that he has been my friend, and I am thankful for his wise counsel.

He is a man of wealth with a heart of gold. Although endowed with this world's goods he has always taken an interest in those less fortunate than himself.

He was one of the first to sponsor cafeterias for workers in plants, and one of the originators of a banking system that made loans to needy people.

He always has taken a great interest in education and made possible the education of a number of youngsters who, without him, never would have been able to attend college.

He has devoted himself to the care of the unfortunates and during his service as Governor of our State he rehabilitated and expanded the facilities at our State institutions. The new and up-to-date buildings that he sponsored there is a monument to his humanitarianism.

This is only a minor part of what could be said of this great man.

Is it any wonder, then, that the leaders and members of the Senate, and, particularly the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, should have tried to prevail on Senator GREEN to continue as chairman. They knew of his devotion to duty and his unrelenting efforts in the interest of our country.

But all their efforts were of no avail. A great man had made a great decision. America came first with Senator GREEN.

While his decision brought regrets we all can take comfort in the fact that Senator GREEN will continue to give of his experience and sound counseling both in the Committee on Foreign Relations and in the U.S. Senate.

We of Rhode Island salute Senator GREEN. We love him.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Dr. MORGAN.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to express my admiration and praise for the distinguished elder statesman, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island. It has been my privilege to serve with Senator GREEN on a number of important conference committees where I had unusual opportunities personally to observe his keenness of intellect and his rare legislative ability.

When Senator GREEN became chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in the last Congress he brought with him an unusual background of fine qualifications for this key post. Senator GREEN is a graduate of Harvard Law School; he received degrees from Brown University, and also studied in the Universities of Bonn and Berlin. He was admitted to the Rhode Island bar in 1892, and has engaged in the practice of law since long before most of us were born. He not only has a profound knowledge of law but also has the distinction of having taught Roman law at Brown University before the turn of the century. His fluency in both French and German, together with his firsthand knowledge of many key areas of the world, increased his value as a member and as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Senator GREEN's long public career is characterized by the time and boundless energy he has given in many fields of activity. He commanded a company of infantry during the Spanish-American War and later served in his State legislature and then as Governor of Rhode Island. He served as a delegate to all Democratic National Conventions from 1912 to 1952, and has been Democratic national committeeman from Rhode Island since 1936.

Senator GREEN has become one of our great outstanding public figures. He has won affection and esteem for his legislative wisdom and skill as well as for his ebullient good spirits. At 91 Senator GREEN is still more vigorous than many a quarter century his junior. Last December Senator GREEN underwent surgery for cataracts and, unfortunately, his vision has not fully returned. He has also suffered a hearing impairment to the extent that it had become increasingly difficult for him to preside over meetings of the Foreign Relations Committee.

A measure of greatness of this distinguished public servant may be found in his voluntary relinquishment of the honors and responsibilities that go with the chairmanship of a major Senate committee. When he realized the physical limitations imposed by his impaired vision and hearing he resigned from this important post so that these impairments would not interfere with the efficient conduct of committee functions.

Fortunately Senator GREEN is retaining his membership on the Foreign Relations Committee. I believe that all who know him agree that his brilliant career is enhanced by this act of patriotic self-sacrifice on his part. The lessening of his visual acuity and his hearing are not of a degree that would interfere with his efficient and capable discharge of his senatorial duties. I am happy that he retains his membership on the Foreign Relations Committee. His long experience, his keen intellect and memory qualify him to serve as an invaluable counselor to his able and brilliant successor and his other colleagues.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take this opportunity to remark briefly that I have enjoyed a very pleasant association with the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, Senator GREEN. He has been chairman of the Senate delegation to the NATO Parliamentary Conference and has always been elected chairman of both the House and Senate delegations when we arrived at the Conference, because we acted as one delegation.

He has made a great contribution because, as my chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has said, he is fluent in both French and German. He has a wide acquaintance among the legislators of the NATO countries, and he has played a profound and influential part in making the NATO Parliamentary Conference a successful, going organization.

It was my good fortune I think 5 or 6 years ago to be present in Bonn, Germany, at which time his fraternity at the University of Bonn gave a dinner for him. I believe he was the only member of his class who was yet alive. At that dinner Senator GREEN gave a speech in fluent German to the assembled members of this fraternity from the University of Bonn. To me it was a tremendously impressive thing. It was an illustration of how he has gone about through the years building good will for the United States in foreign countries.

I am sorry to see him leave the chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee, but I quite agree with my chairman, Dr. MORGAN, that it was a measure of his mark as a statesman that when physical impairment involved him to such an extent that he thought he could not quite give 100 percent the effective service he had been giving he chose to retire. I am glad he stayed on the committee and I am glad he is still in the Senate, and that we will have the benefit of his advice.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, it is not only an official but a personal pleasure for me to join with my distinguished friend the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] in honoring the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, Senator THEODORE F. GREEN.

I have known Senator GREEN for the past 30 years. He served with me on three occasions on the Democratic committee on platform and resolutions of the Democratic National Committee, also as a member of the drafting subcommittee.

The record Senator GREEN has made in public life as Governor of his State and as a Member of the U.S. Senate has made its profound impression upon the pages of this history of his State and of our Nation.

Senator GREEN is a gentleman in every respect—one who can disagree without being disagreeable. He symbolizes the fine things of life that enable him to be a symbol and inspiration for others to follow. As a legislator in the Senate of the Congress of the United States, Senator GREEN has wielded a powerful and constructive influence. In the trying world of today, Senator GREEN has sensed the real issues which confront all nations and all peoples who want to be free under their own law. He knows the dangers of the press of atheistic communism and has ably given leadership to combat the same. He is one of the great Americans of this trying period of the world's history and the people of America are grateful that he is serving in the Congress of the United States during this historic period.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that any other Members who may desire to do so may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD regarding Senator GREEN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to join in this well-deserved tribute to the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, the Honorable THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

Senator GREEN's long and outstanding record of public service cannot fail to impress everyone in these halls. As soldier, State legislator, chief executive of the State of Rhode Island, and then a Member of the United States Senate, he served his State and Nation with devotion and brilliance seldom matched in the annals of our history.

As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I have had particular occasion to observe Senator GREEN's work in that important field. He was untiring in his efforts aimed at strengthening our foreign policy programs, and advancing the unity of the free world in the face of the Communist threat. He made a tremendous personal contribution to this end through his extensive travels and his numerous personal contacts abroad.

I was deeply moved when, out of pure devotion to his country, Senator GREEN decided to relinquish the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the belief that the heavy burdens of that office may be borne by younger shoulders. His completely unselfish decision will always remain as an example and inspiration to the men and women chosen by the American people to represent them in these halls. I am very happy, however, that Senator GREEN will continue as the ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. His wise counsel and wealth of experience are very much needed in these crucial times, and I am glad that they will continue to be at the service of our country.

In concluding, I want to wish the senior Senator from Rhode Island the best of health and God's choicest blessings in the years to come. May he continue serving our country in this legislative body for many more years.

FEDERAL AID TO DEPRESSED AREAS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, on February 23, or yesterday, I introduced H.R. 4878, a bill to aid depressed areas.

It might be said that what we need right now is not new bills to aid depressed areas but an act signed by the President which would bring Federal assistance to the scores of communities in the United States which have for years been plagued with chronic unemployment. I fully agree with this view.

My record in favor of depressed area legislation is crystal clear.

For years I have cooperated with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle interested in this type of legislation and my disappointment was as great as theirs when the President vetoed the Douglas-Spence bill last fall.

Mr. Speaker, on the subject of Federal aid to depressed areas there are some excellent bills pending before this session of Congress. In this connection, it would not be difficult for me to support the bill introduced by my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], and its companion bill in the Senate introduced by Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois.

At this point, however, it is pertinent to ask—and I do so in all sincerity—why solicit a repetition of last year's veto by having the Douglas-Flood bill given similar treatment since it resembles to a marked degree the Douglas-Spence bill in the 85th Congress.

Frankly, the possibility of another veto is cause for great concern.

While there is no one in the Senate or the House who would stoop to playing politics with the misery of unemployment, we cannot ignore the fact that unless a bill is enacted the suffering of the people in the depressed areas is not going to be alleviated.

Mr. Speaker, among the sponsors of depressed area legislation there exist two conflicting points of view.

To begin with, in principle the administration has endorsed aid to depressed areas.

In addition, the two great major political parties also endorsed the principle in their 1956 platforms.

Therefore, the question that Congress must resolve is the extent of aid to the depressed areas of the Nation.

In an effort to reach this common objective, it is imperative that reasonable people should be willing to compromise.

In this connection, it is my belief that the President will find it possible to accept a reasonable compromise between the administration bill and the Douglas-Flood version of the legislation.

In my plea for a reasonable compromise, it must be thoroughly understood that I am not presuming to speak for the administration nor have I had any consultations with administration leaders on the subject.

Mr. Speaker, let us be practical and face the facts concerning depressed area legislation.

In the event of a Presidential veto of the Douglas-Flood bill, I have been unable to find anyone willing to flatly predict that the veto will be overridden by the House of Representatives.

The fear of being unable to override a veto is based on the fact that it requires two-thirds of the votes cast to accomplish that purpose.

Therefore—looking the facts right in the face—when you review the position of those Members of the House today in relation to their last year's vote on the Douglas-Spence bill, one finds that the margin of victory would be insufficient to override a possible Presidential veto of the Douglas-Flood bill.

Mr. Speaker, to improve our chances of enacting depressed area legislation, I introduced H.R. 4878, a bill which represents a compromise between the administration's approach and the Douglas-Flood proposal.

With a few exceptions, my compromise bill, H.R. 4878, offers the same types of aid contained in the Douglas-Spence bill vetoed last year.

For example, instead of making every depressed area eligible for the same types of assistance, my bill provides different degrees of Federal assistance based upon the level of chronic unemployment and the need in such areas.

In this connection, it is my belief that areas which have suffered greater levels of unemployment should be entitled to a greater degree of aid than those communities whose problems of unemployment are of a lesser degree.

Briefly, my bill, H.R. 4878, provides for the following programs:

First. Technical assistance: Depressed areas would be eligible for technical assistance to help the communities to appraise their physical and human resources, which would prepare them to plan constructive programs to attract new businesses and expand existing businesses in these areas.

Second. Community loans: Depressed communities would be eligible to receive loans from a revolving fund of $100 million.

We know that the conventional lending facilities in depressed areas are not as venturesome as those in growing and expanding communities.

The fund would put the depressed areas on a more equal footing with other communities in attracting new jobs.

Third. Public facilities: Some communities need improvement in public facilities before they would become sufficiently attractive to new businesses which might desire to locate in these areas.

My bill provides for an establishment of a $25 million revolving fund from which these communities would be able to borrow.

While the figure may appear modest, attention is called to the fact that legislation is pending before the House which would establish special funds for community facilities.

Meanwhile, under my bill, H.R. 4878, a smaller fund would be allocated and earmarked to aid depressed areas.

In addition, the most depressed communities which do not have the sufficient resources to borrow funds would be eligible to receive grants up to a maximum of $25 million.

At this point, let me stress that this is not an annual appropriation but is intended to be a $25 million revolving fund from which these communities would be able to borrow.

The administrator of the program would be expected to limit the grants only to communities with the greatest need for aid and which do not have sufficient resources to repay the loans in the foreseeable future.

It should be stressed that this is no giveaway program; under the provisions of my bill grants would be made only for projects which would provide lasting improvements and thus broaden the economic base of the communities.

Fourth. Vocational training and subsistence: One of the big problems of the people in depressed areas is the fact that many of their industries have declined or disappeared and, consequently, the demand for the skills acquired by the people in these areas has also diminished or vanished.

In order to enable these people whose skills have become obsolete to gain new employment, we must provide facilities to retrain them.

But many have been unemployed for a long period of time, and it would be unreasonable to expect that they could undergo an effective period of vocational training without any means of support.

Consequently, while the unemployed are undergoing training and if they are no longer eligible for unemployment compensation, they would be receiving subsistence payments equal to the average unemployment insurance in their States during the period while they are undergoing training, but not for a period exceeding 13 weeks.

Only the unemployed residing in the communities with the highest level of unemployment would be eligible for this type of aid and the total amount that would be appropriated for this program would be limited to $5 million a year.

Mr. Speaker, in brief, these are the provisions of my compromise bill, H.R. 4878.

They are modest, but at the same time will provide a sound program of Federal assistance to depressed areas.

All of us are deeply concerned by the latest reports about the rise of unemployment.

Experience has shown that the people in depressed areas are the ones that are mostly hit by any rise in unemployment and are the last to recover from the onslaught of recession.

Therefore, it is urged that we enact the program contained in my compromise bill, H.R. 4878, as a realistic means of providing an effective program to aid the chronically depressed areas of the Nation.

Since the cost of depressed area legislation has proved a stumbling block in the past and impeded our efforts, let me point out that the cost of the Douglas-Flood bill is $389.5 million as compared to the cost of the administration bill which is $53 million.

By way of contrast, my compromise bill, H.R. 4878, will cost $158 million or just about midway between the cost of the Douglas-Flood bill and the administration bill.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in my remarks I should like to include the following comparative analysis of the provisions and costs of the Douglas-Flood, administration, and Van Zandt bills:

Mr. Speaker, in connection with depressed area legislation, let me state that I have no pride of authorship.

My sole desire is to aid the people in the depressed areas and to attain such a laudable objective the spirit of compromise should be dominant in our minds.

As one who represents two chronically depressed areas in Pennsylvania with unemployment as high as 14 percent of our labor force and which has plagued us for years, my goal is that Congress enact without delay an effective bill in a form acceptable to the President, thereby eliminating the prospects of another Presidential veto.

Mr. Speaker, the residents of the 269 depressed areas of the Nation are entitled to this type of legislation, and it is my sincere hope that we can compromise any differences and enact a depressed area bill without further delay.

THE LATE DAVID PATRICK DOYLE

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago I was deeply saddened and greatly shocked with the news of the loss of a close associate and dear friend who served as my administrative assistant in my early days as a Member of this House. His untimely death comes as a great loss not only to his family and to those like myself with whom he had been associated, but also to the many Members of the Congress with whom he had a bond of close friendship.

I refer to David Patrick Doyle, affectionately known to all of us as Dave Doyle.

When I was first elected to the House and came to take my seat in the 77th Congress in January 1941 Dave came with me as my assistant. He had worked diligently on my behalf in the campaign of 1940 and willingly gave up his law practice in the State of Rhode Island and his position as acting district court judge of the fourth district court to cast his fortunes with my own.

I can never forget the tremendous assistance which he gave me in those early days when as an uninitiated Member of Congress I needed valuable advice and assistance to guide me in the appropriate and effective discharge of my congressional duties. I found in Dave Doyle a tower of strength upon whom I heavily relied.

In 1948 Dave chose to return to his career as a lawyer and assumed a position as counsel in the legal department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. Here he found an opportunity to use his rich talents for the advancement of the many national charities and educational programs which that great organization sponsors.

Dave Doyle was not a complex individual. He exemplified simplicity and directness and avoided all pretense and false pride. His affable and good-natured personality recommended him to all. He was devoted to his family, to his country and to his friends, and he demonstrated these loyalties in numerous ways on numerous occasions.

I truly believe that I can say he left a mark of improvement upon anyone with whom he was closely associated, and in that sense lived a rich, full life during the 49 years which he spent here. To his devoted wife, Mary, and his children, David P., Jr., Sheila, Michael, and Maureen he has left a record of achievement of which they can always be justly proud. My prayer is that his family will be consoled by the knowledge that Dave's life was well and valuably spent. I extend to them my deep and sincere sympathy upon their loss.

Dave was particularly devoted to his native State of Rhode Island and despite his many years of residence here in the Washington area, never lost his active interest in the welfare of that State.

His keen interest in political affairs continued and I cannot recall a campaign in which I have been actively engaged in which Dave Doyle was not ever ready to assist me in every way.

I personally feel his loss very deeply—it is the loss of a loyal, devoted friend of whom there are few and far between. In the years to come I shall remember his ability, his accomplishments, his constructiveness, his noble character, and all that he stood for. In my memory I shall always cherish his friendship.

The last thing that Dave Doyle would want is anything in the way of a eulogy. However, I shall always remember that his own pastor, Rev. Paul V. Heller, in mentioning this fact on the day of his funeral, told the hundreds of friends and relatives gathered there that Dave could not object to a quotation from the scriptures which aptly summarized his life. It was this:

> Lay not up to yourselves treasures on earth: where the rust and moth consume, and where thieves break through, and steal. But lay up to yourselves treasures in heaven: where neither the rust nor moth doth consume, and where thieves do not break through, nor steal. For where thy treasure is, there is thy heart also.

The National Catholic Welfare Conference, with whom Dave Doyle was associated at the time of his death, issued a bulletin to advise its members of his untimely passing. Since their tribute so well typifies what is in all our hearts, I am taking the liberty of quoting it in full:

> On January 26, after a lingering illness, Mr. David Patrick Doyle was called to his eternal reward.
> In his death the legal department, of whose staff he was for 11 years a valued member, has suffered a loss that is truly poignant and irreparable.
> Those who were associated with him personally not only cherished the warmth of his unique and buoyant personality, but were in constant admiration of his utter dedication to the noblest ideals of Christian life and work.
> To those ideals he gave himself with unswerving persistence expressed so often in his admonition, "Stout heart," and strengthened by an almost childlike confidence in the aid of the Holy Ghost. It was as though he had been inspired by the words of the psalmist: "He chose David, too for his servant; took him away from herding the sheep * * * bade him be the shepherd of * * * his own people * * * his own domain. His was the loyal heart that should tend them, his the skillful hand that should be their guide."
> His devotion to home and family, to country, and to his church was absorbing, indeed almost passionate, in its intensity. His faith, and his love for the church were the consuming interests of a life of service whose record can find adequate recognition only in the book of life.
> To his mother, his widow, his children, and all the other sorrowing members of his family we of the legal department who were privileged to share the grace of his talents and his friendship offer our deepfelt and prayerful sympathy in a loss that we, too, feel ever so keenly.
> May he rest in peace.

DANIEL A. REED

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the passing of our distinguished colleague, Hon. DANIEL A. REED, of New York, a close friend of mine for so many years, is indeed a very great shock to me. For over a third of a century, we worked together in the House of Representatives. Together we faced many grave and difficult decisions involving the United States of America. A great American, his patriotism and loyalty to his country was a part of every fiber of his physical body and every emotion of his mind and heart and soul.

Possessed of the highest principles, of the finest ideals, of the highest integrity, the Honorable DANIEL A. REED, during his long career of public service, has carved his place in the history of America. His great work in the Congress of the United States will stand forever as a monument of achievement for his Nation and country which he so deeply loved. As a man of steel and determination, he courageously faced up to every challenge of all he thought was right. As a man of gentle spirit, his kindness touched the lives of many. But more than these great deeds, more than his great accomplishments, more than his tremendous contribution during his time on earth, is his gentleness and fairness toward his fellow men. I came to know this kindness, this thoughtfulness, and this gentle courtesy. In the memory and hearts of his associates here and elsewhere these gentle qualities are forever engraved.

With his fine family, his wonderful wife, and all his colleagues, I join in the mourning of his passing. I know that those of us who worked with him and knew him so well are better for this enriching association. I know that our country is a finer place in which to live because of his dedicated work and his greatness. Mankind has deeply benefited because of his life on earth. Able and courageous, honored and respected, the people of America are proud this great man was born, developed, molded in this land of freedom. All America gave him, he gave back in quality and quantity. Those of us who knew him so well are proud he was our friend and are thankful for his association. Surely his mission in life and on earth has been fulfilled. Now he belongs to God.

HOW THE PEOPLE OF WISCONSIN FEEL ABOUT DICTATORS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, the people of Wisconsin love democracy and our free, democratic institutions as deeply and devotedly as the people of any State. And, like the vast majority of all of the people of the United States, the people of Wisconsin hate dictatorships.

Nowhere in the heritage of Wisconsin's people is there anything to indicate acceptance or approval of dictatorial, tyrannical governments. On the contrary, the people of Wisconsin are in large measure the descendants of immigrants who came to the United States to gain freedom, from such countries as Germany, Norway, Ireland and Poland, where in many cases they were deprived of liberty and of the benefits of self-government. These immigrants and their descendants loathe dictatorships in any form. My own grandfather was a forty-eighter, one of the many German immigrants who came to the United States more than a century ago because they abhorred tyranny.

The history of Wisconsin is filled with examples of the State's leadership in making democracy work. Wisconsin was in the forefront of the great political, social and educational reforms of the 20th century which improved and advanced our democratic institutions. The progressive tradition, epitomized by Old Bob La Follette, vigorously opposed all forms of political bossism thwarting genuine democratic self-government. The great University of Wisconsin and the other educational institutions of the State are dedicated to the dissemination of truth, and the advancement of freedom. This is the Wisconsin idea, the Wisconsin way of life.

Mr. Speaker, we in Wisconsin respect the right of all nations to choose their own form of government. We believe that the United States should not interfere in the internal affairs of other countries. We hope that other peoples will, of their own volition, choose democratic institutions as the best means of improving their own well-being.

We recognize that certain social and economic forces have erected powerful obstacles to the achievement of stable democracies in many parts of the world. We observe this to be true in Latin America. But we have also seen, and we applaud, the solid progress that democratic forces have made recently in Latin America.

In the last decade, dictatorial regimes have been overthrown in Argentina, Peru, Venezuela, Colombia, and Cuba. Only four dictators remain—in the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Nicaragua, and Paraguay.

The people of Wisconsin, I am sure, feel that democratic governments dedicated to advancing industrialization, wiping out illiteracy, spreading the techniques of modern medicine, and in general raising the standard of living of the underprivileged masses, offer the best hope of destroying the possibility of the growth of communism in Latin America.

We in Wisconsin think it significant that more and more individuals and groups—educators, labor groups, leading members of the Catholic Church, lay groups of many kinds—have played active and articulate roles leading to the overthrow of dictatorships in Latin America.

The people of Wisconsin earnestly hope that this trend toward democracy in Latin America will continue. We firmly believe that the Government of the United States should cooperate to the fullest with these democratic regimes. We believe in extending hearty greetings and warm friendship to democratic governments. We believe that dictators, on the other hand, should be treated with coolness but diplomatic correctness.

One of the dictatorships existing in Latin America is that of the Dominican Republic, presided over by Generalissimo Rafael Trujillo.

Mr. Speaker, I think the people of Wisconsin and the Nation are well aware of the fact that the Trujillo government is a dictatorship. It is not necessary to list here the activities of Trujillo, but to illustrate the point briefly I wish to quote the following paragraphs from an editorial which appeared in the Milwaukee Journal on February 17, 1959:

> Trujillo has been operating for a long time. He has managed to take over for himself and his family most of the profitable businesses of the country. The saying goes that if a business "loses money, it's government owned; if it makes money, it's Trujillo's."
> His brother Hector is President of the country. His brother Arismendi is a lieutenant general and head of public information and culture. Two other brothers are high in the armed forces. His son Rafael, Jr. (Ramfis), is a lieutenant general and chief of staff.
> Half of the armed forces officers above the rank of colonel are Trujillo relatives. Political opponents have been liquidated or are in jail. His people do just exactly what he tells them, or else. He is a dictator in the worst sense—and he differs from the worst of his kind only in that he has spent some public money for public purposes.

Mr. Speaker, we in Wisconsin do not advocate any interference on the part of our Government leading to the overthrow of the Trujillo regime. But the people of Wisconsin, I am sure, recognize what this regime represents—a mockery of democratic aspirations.

Mr. Speaker, I have just read a speech given recently before the Congress of the Dominican Republic by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW]. This speech is highly laudatory of Generalissimo Trujillo and his government.

It is my practice never to engage in personal contention with other Members of the House over their speeches.

However, Mr. Speaker, because this speech in the Dominican Republic was given by a Representative of Wisconsin, appearing in the capacity of an official visitor, I feel that I must comment on it. I shall do so without engaging in personalities, and without rancor, but to set forth what I feel certain to be the feelings of the people of Wisconsin on this subject.

I would like to point out that yesterday I wrote the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW] giving him prior notification, as follows:

> CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
> HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
> Washington, D.C., February 23, 1958.
> HON. GARDNER R. WITHROW,
> Member of Congress, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.
> DEAR GARDNER: I am securing a special order to address the House tomorrow, Tuesday, February 24, 1959, on the problem of dictators.
>
> In the course of this address, I shall have to refer to your recent remarks to the Dominican Congress as reported in the Herald of the Dominican Republic, dated Saturday, February 7, 1959. I enclose a copy of the text of your speech as it appeared in this newspaper. I intend to offer this text for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.
> I am writing this letter so that you may have prior notification of my subject.
> Sincerely,
> HENRY S. REUSS,

Mr. Speaker, I herewith include the text of the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW] before the Dominican Congress in joint session as it appears in the Herald of the Dominican Republic dated Saturday, February 7, 1959:

COMPLETE TEXT OF SPEECH OF U.S. REPRESENTATIVE GARDNER R. WITHROW BEFORE DOMINICAN CONGRESS IN JOINT SESSION, AS IT APPEARS IN THE HERALD OF THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC, DATED SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1959

I am somewhat surprised to find myself here today. I came here as an invited visitor, and I hope, as a friend. But, you have raised me to the level of an official visitor, and you have bestowed upon me a privilege that is yours alone to give. I shall long remember this privilege.

The weather, the food, the hospitality of those in official positions and those good citizens whom I met on streets, in offices, and in their homes—all have impressed me greatly. I suppose I should confine myself to political niceties, and to spend my time recounting some of the details of my visits and my observations. And I suppose I ought to speak in platitudes.

But I am not going to do this. I am not going to waste your time. Rather, I am going to tell you what I think, and how I feel on some events and matters which are of supreme importance to you and to me.

LAUDS DOMINICAN REPUBLIC INDEPENDENCE

What I am about to say might be interpreted as independence. It is. It is the same type of independence which you as a nation have displayed, and for which you are admired. I have always had the feeling that the Dominican Republic by its nature is always willing to meet another country or another person more than halfway—a feeling that you wanted to be liked and to like. But, at the same time, it is also clear that you do not really need anyone to get along. I congratulate you on a true independence.

For a time, I had thought I might visit in the Dominican Republic in a capacity as a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. Instead, I stand before you as a friend who is free to say and do what he thinks is right. To achieve a committee seat, I would not have been free to speak out openly as I have done, and as I expect to do in the Congress of the United States. I do not bargain in principles of this nature. There are those in the Republican administration who would impose upon those of us of the same political party certain restrictions, which I, for one, was unwilling to accept in order to gain some little personal objective in the way of committee assignments in the Congress. But let us leave this.

EXPRESSES CONCERN OVER WAR

I am seriously concerned with the rumors of war, not in the international sense, but in the sense of armed conflict in the Caribbean and in this hemisphere.

There are small groups in the Congress of the United States who covet war and who encourage revolution.

This same type encouraged Hungary, and then left that little nation by itself in the crucial hour, and in the final analysis. You all know the result. I would not place much faith in the willingness or ability of any Member of Congress to lead or fight in a battle for democracy except in debate in the Congress.

That is the way they fought the battle to liberate Hungary from the Communists, and the Communists hold Hungary more tightly today and there are many, many more graves to mark the evidence of the uselessness of such leadership.

In a couple of instances, revolution in this hemisphere has led to big loans being granted by the United States to the successful revolutionaries.

It is thus evident that politics is profitable, and that we will pay for brigandry. It is also evident that these revolutionaries cannot cope with the complexities of modern government.

I am afraid too many of us in the Congress have read the famous speeches of 1775, but at the same time we fail to acknowledge we are not the men of steel of '75.

IN CONGRESS, A NITWIT OR TWO

Like any other country, we in the United States have a nitwit or two. But, unlike so many other nations, we sometimes elect one or two to the Congress. It just so happens that these are usually elected on the mistaken idea that they are not expedient.

Let me tell you very frankly and truthfully that the United States is not free to make the decisions today that it might make under other circumstances. The foreign aid program, about which the American taxpayer yells so loudly, is mute evidence that we recognize the fact that we are not free to decide a problem or an issue.

One of the reasons the United States seems so confusing is that not since the Civil War has the United States tasted war upon American soil. Several times we have gone to war over on another street (and by this word street I mean another country) and we have participated in tearing the devil out of someone else's yard. When it was all over, we have returned home to our own neat yard and street, which was unchanged from before and witnessed no destruction.

You may recall that during War One, one of the great songs was "Over There." It meant someplace else. In War Two the United States Air Force sang almost to a man "Off we go into the wide blue yonder"—which meant someplace else again. Most recently, we were in a war in Korea. It was simply called "the Korean war," which plainly located it far outside the United States.

War has taught the United States absolutely nothing, because the people at home have not suffered from want, from injury. It will take yet another war to teach us anything.

The buzz bomb and the airplane in World War II reduced the natural barrier of the English Channel to nothing, and real pain came to London. The missile has reduced the Atlantic to nothing, and next time pain, hunger, misery, and suffering will surely come to the United States.

It last came to us in 1861, and it was horrible. We have simply forgotten it all. We called our internal war a civil war. Just why, I do not recall at the moment since I am not much of a scholar in the military sense. I do know that our War Between the States was fought because neither Abraham Lincoln nor anyone else could clearly define between the social and the political.

CITES LINCOLN

Even today it goes on in the Congress of the United States. The political equalities of man are unmistakable in the Constitution of the United States. The social equalities are what we are arguing about, I suppose. Wasn't it Abraham Lincoln who said, "This Nation cannot exist, half slave and half free"? Let's apply those immortal words of Lincoln to today's cold war with communism. Can this world exist when peoples are half enslaved by communism and are half free? It is thus apparent that war three is on the horizon.

REASONS FOR WAR

There are just four reasons for war. First would be a war for land to live upon. Second is a war for wealth. Third is a war for power. Fourth and last is a war for security.

I cannot envision, nor does history record any instance, of the Dominican Republic engaging in any war except for security. That is why these reports about aggression in the Caribbean and the Latin Americas is so ridiculous to me, and to those of us who do any thinking in the Congress.

On the other hand, the overtones of the reports of aggression upon the Dominican Republic are reminiscent of Communist propaganda.

Always, the Hitlers and the Stalins have started up rumor wars, and usually started wars, on the ground it was necessary to save some country or people from itself or to protect themselves and their country. We are hearing that propaganda now. Let me bluntly tell you to beware, and to see it for what it is. And, let me tell you further, you cannot predict American reaction.

There were those in the United States who were overjoyed when rebellion took place recently in Cuba. Then, we were horrified that blood ran in the streets, and that we were called "Gringos." In Venezuela we cheered a revolution that we knew nothing about. Yet we were appalled when the new junta levied another 10 percent on our oil investments. Some of the Members of the Congress are all for revolution, but not satisfied with the postrevolution.

A PREDICTION: TROUBLE

I predict that if the United States continues to condone revolutions, and works toward any solidification of these revolution governments, we will have succeeded in joining together a new force in this hemisphere whose demands upon the United States will be beyond our imagination, and definitely against the United States interests and those of the remainder of the hemisphere.

Revolution is nothing more than the pitting of father against brother, and son against son, the dividing of families. The Latin is foremost in the world in dedication to his family, even into second and third cousins. Therefore, I can think of no greater crime against Christianity than to initiate a war—a civil war—in which families are divided against themselves. The Spanish civil war, in which Anglo-Saxons were joined on both sides, will be a lasting monument in horror, if we think of it from the Spanish speaking point of view, which we must.

It must seem to you that I have spoken at some length upon revolutions. I have, because they are war, and I do not want war, and you don't either.

For more than a quarter of a century you in the Dominican Republic have lived in peace and security. No other American state has achieved the prosperity you have. No other state could give you more than you have now. It is quite possible, however, that there are other states which might like to have yours, and may resort to armed means to try to get it. And these invaders do not charge ashore with a banner and dedication to your welfare.

Recognize them for the politically dissatisfied, the international brigands they probably will be, whose goal is personal power not government for the people, and who play the stakes of today for international revolution, and usually a big United States loan. It's diplomatic plunder.

I am not too happy with the fact that the United States has served as an incubator, or springboard, for plotting. The policy of nonintervention also should be one of detention of those who would use the Congress of the United States or the United States itself for their own political welfare.

PUERTO RICO A LIABILITY

I am not at all happy over the situation which seems to be prevalent in Puerto Rico, your neighbor. This United States possession appears to harbor political liabilities to the Western Hemisphere. Living there at this time is one known to you who could not satisfy his political ambitions, but is trying to satisfy his hates. I refer, of course, to German Ornes.

I was also distressed recently to learn that it was Gov. Muñoz Marín, of Puerto Rico, who was quoted by an Assistant Secretary of State for the United States as their authority upon the personal integrity and purposes of the new revolutionary leader of Cuba.

It is peculiar that the State Department had no information of its own upon which to base a course of decision. But, it is far more strange that the political leader of a United States land should be on such familiar terms.

In the new Congress, in lieu of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I asked for and got membership on the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. This committee handles much of the legislation and affairs of Puerto Rico, among others.

I can promise you this—that I shall get to the bottom, and to the solution, of some of these strange things.

SUGGESTS TRUJILLO VISIT WASHINGTON

It has been my pleasure to meet with your President, the Honorable Héctor Trujillo. His simplicity is warming, and his programs sound and promising. It was my keen personal pleasure to meet with Generalissimo Trujillo.

The Dominican Ambassador to the United States, the Honorable Manuel A. de Moya, had spoken so knowingly and lovingly of Generalissimo Trujillo that I was prepared for a monumental meeting. But, I was not prepared for this meeting at all. I say this candidly—you have got to be with the generalissimo and speak with him before you actually catch up with the personality and full concept of the man who has given the Dominican Republic these great 27 years.

Ambassador de Moya is easily the star of the diplomatic corps in Washington. However, I remarked to the Ambassador that if the Dominican Republic could persuade the generalissimo to come to Washington I should be surprised if there wasn't a whole, new foreign policy concept given to the Western Hemisphere and the world.

This is no depreciation of Ambassador de Moya, but more an appreciation of the insight and organizational concepts needed in Washington in our State Department and the foreign policies.

I lack the time in residence here, the personal knowledge, and the understanding of conditions of yesteryear to grandize Generalissimo Trujillo honestly and completely.

In a brief 27 years—which is nothing in measuring history and government—the Dominican Republic went from rags and ruin to the position today where you are the envy of all your neighbors and many foreign nations. In moving that quickly, I think it only natural that the general may have stepped upon some toes and perhaps offended some others, and some may hate him for it.

Our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, earned violent hatred in pulling the United States out of a staggering depression. Today Roosevelt, another great, stepped upon more touchy toes than any American. That patient and brilliant great, Abraham Lincoln, plunged us into a civil war, for which he was hated and assassinated. The number of your enemies is not a measure of your worth, but more a yardstick of your success.

I would suspect the generalissimo's love for his country and his dedicated drive to raise its economy and international standing to its highest possible levels before he goes to a greater Christian reward might make him somewhat impatient with those who seek to intercede with his forward march of progress. But, our general, Dwight Eisenhower, is known to get impatient, too, with associates whose views he regards as not in the national interests. As a matter of cold fact, I sometimes get impatient also, and I am sure most of you have too.

THE IGNORANCE OF CRITICS

Thus, with the critics, you must remember they are always people who can't do it themselves, but always manage to get themselves into a position where they feel they can tell others how to do it.

There is no one in the Congress of the United States who knows the generalissimo personally, or knows the Dominican Republic has. The critics are made up of dissatisfied politicians, the ignorant, and those with such infertile minds that they succumb to the suave chicaneries of exiles and liberals of the type of Muñoz-Marín of Puerto Rico.

I seriously doubt I would be standing here today if the Dominican Republic had any other but Trujillo at the helm. I am not just guessing when I say this—because you can survey some of your neighbors both east and west to refresh your memories—I am not guessing or taking too great a liberty in stating that this would have been just another Latin republic without the genius and the forceful drive of the generalissimo. I think you know this, too. I said I wanted to speak frankly, and in this same vein I firmly believe that if Generalissimo Trujillo had been born in the United States he would have been elected President of those United States.

Perhaps if he had, there would be no cold war, no widespread communism that there is today. And, from a taxpayer standpoint, there would have been no $300 billion national debt we have today either. I don't know how you do this, but he has succeeded in establishing a record of having no external debt—the only country I know of able to do so.

DEBT DIDN'T PASS UNITED STATES BY

We have never been able to find a man who could achieve that financial stability and yet manage to develop our natural resources and bring a full prosperity under peaceful means.

If you people don't know how well off you are you are going to find out someday under another circumstance. This Congress could achieve no greater help for the Dominican Republic than to begin now determining just how the era of Trujillo can be carried on into perpetuity. You owe that to the Dominican Republic and you would contribute greatly to the Dominican Republic, and you would contribute greatly to the welfare of the hemisphere. You ought to do it now while you have the abilities yet at hand to do it right and lastingly.

I have spoken frankly, and perhaps a little too long. It is very probable I have covered too many fields. If I have, I must apologize to you, one and all. But, just as France had her Foreign Legion, the Dominican Republic has a foreign legion, too, and I am just a soldier in your ranks. I hope you will support your Government, that you will defend your Government from within and without, and I shall help you. You can always count on me.

You have been gracious, you have been kind, and stimulating. Until we meet again.

Mr. Speaker, in the light of what I said earlier, it is only necessary to reiterate a few central points.

First, the people of Wisconsin respect the organs of democracy in general, and the Congress of the United States in particular. Yet the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW] is quoted as saying:

For a time, I had thought I might visit in the Dominican Republic in a capacity as a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. Instead, I stand before you as a friend who is free to say and do what he thinks is right. To achieve a committee seat, I would not have been free to speak out openly as I have done, and as I expect to do in the Congress of the United States.

And again:

Like any other country, we in the United States have a nitwit or two. But, unlike so many other nations, we sometimes elect one or two to the Congress.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield.

Mr. HAYS. The last statement I would say would be a complete violation of the rules of the House, and I would be constrained to offer a resolution to do something about it, but I have had the privilege of reading the complete speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and after reading it I do not know whether I will object.

Mr. REUSS. And again the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW] is quoted as saying:

I would not place much faith in the willingness or ability of any Member of Congress to lead or fight in a battle for democracy except in debate in the Congress.

Second, the people of Wisconsin think dictatorship is an evil, not something to be exalted and glorified. Yet the gentleman from Wisconsin is quoted as having said:

For more than a quarter of a century you in the Dominican Republic have lived in peace and security. No other American state has achieved the prosperity you have. No other state could give you more than you have now.

And again:

I congratulate you on a true independence.

And again:

It has been my pleasure to meet with your President, the Honorable Hector Trujillo. His simplicity is warming, and his programs sound and promising. It was my keen personal pleasure to meet with Generalissimo Trujillo * * * I say this candidly—you have got to be with the Generalissimo and speak with him before you actually catch up with the personality and full concept of the man who has given the Dominican Republic these great 27 years. Ambassador de Moya is easily the star of the diplomatic corps in Washington.

And again:

I firmly believe that if Generalissimo Trujillo had been born in the United States he would have been elected President of those United States.

Thirdly, the people of Wisconsin are proud of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico—that showcase of democracy in the Caribbean—nd of its inspiring leader, Governor Muñoz-Marín. Yet the gentleman from Wisconsin is quoted as saying:

The critics (of the Dominican Republic) are made up of dissatisfied politicians, the ignorant, and those with such infertile minds that they succumb to the suave chicaneries of exiles and liberals of the type of Muñoz-Marín of Puerto Rico.

And again:

I am not at all happy over the situation which seems to be prevalent in Puerto Rico, your neighbor. This U.S. possession appears to harbor political liabilities to the Western Hemisphere. * * *

I was also distressed recently to learn that it was Governor Muñoz-Marín of Puerto Rico who was quoted by an Assistant Secretary of State for the United States as their authority upon the personal integrity and purposes of the new revolutionary leader of Cuba.

It is peculiar that the State Department had no information of its own upon which to base a course of decision. But it is far more strange that the political leader of a U.S. land should be on such familiar terms.

In the new Congress, in lieu of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I asked for and got membership on the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. This committee handles much of the legislation and affairs of Puerto Rico, among others.

I can promise you this—that I shall get to the bottom, and to the solution, of some of these strange things.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW], as an "official visitor" to the Dominican Republic, was not expressing the views of the people of Wisconsin in that speech. I have endeavored to set the record straight in that respect, for the people of Wisconsin are the only ones for whom I have a right to speak.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that those who can speak for the people of the entire United States—the President and the Secretary of State, or the acting chief of the State Department—will speak out firmly and strongly to men and women everywhere who love freedom, and make clear that the views expressed by the gentleman from Wisconsin not only do not represent the people of Wisconsin, but do not represent the people of the United States, nor the policy of the Government of the United States.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, our Latin American neighbors have been sharply critical of the United States because of a widespread feeling among them that we are not only kindly disposed toward Latin dictators but actually support their efforts to remain in power. Many of us have long urged that our Government make every attempt to allay these fears of our Latin American friends through concrete, affirmative actions.

In the midst of efforts by our Government to show our Latin American neighbors that we truly believe in a democratic form of rule for all people the gentleman from Wisconsin's Fifth District cites an address which unequivocally supports the dictatorship of Generalissimo Trujillo in the Dominican Republic.

Mr. Speaker, I join the gentleman from Wisconsin's Fifth District in expressing regret and concern over such remarks. I wish to assure you that the people of the Second District of Wisconsin and myself are dedicated in our opposition to any form of tyrannical rule, whether it is Generalissimo Trujillo's or any other. And I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin's Fifth District for pointing out to this body the tradition and heritage of the people of the State of Wisconsin in their opposition to military dictatorships and their faith in our democracy.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. The gentleman from Wisconsin read a part of the article from the Dominican newspaper, but he did not read the entire quotation, and I would like to have in the RECORD the rest of this speech made in a foreign country to a foreign legislature. The gentleman read, and I quote:

> For a time I had thought I might visit in the Dominican Republic in a capacity as a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. Instead, I stand before you as a friend who is free to say and do what he thinks is right. To achieve a committee seat, I would not have been free to speak out openly as I have done, and as I expect to do in the Congress of the United States.

The gentleman stopped there. I wish to continue. I read further:

> I do not bargain in principles of this nature. There are those in the Republican administration who would impose upon those of us of the same political party certain restrictions, which I, for one, was unwilling to accept in order to gain some little personal objective in the way of committee assignment in the Congress.

Now, here is a Member of Congress talking to a foreign legislature, saying that in order to get a seat on the Foreign Affairs Committee that his party required of him something that he was unwilling to give. I am defending his party because I would like to know what it was that his party was demanding of him that was so odious that he would not take a seat on the Foreign Affairs Committee because he would have to comply. I do not think that seats on the Foreign Affairs Committee or any other committee are handed out in that fashion, and I do not think it behooves a Member of the Congress of the United States to go to a foreign country and get up in front of their legislature and make any such assertions, which is not only a reflection on his party, the Republican Party, but which is also a reflection upon the Democratic Party and the Congress of the United States and the people of the United States.

I also think if it was not illegal, certainly it was unethical, to get up and say, as the gentleman is quoted as saying before the same legislature, to not only say that if Generalissimo Trujillo—and I want to say for the record that I never at any time attacked the leader of the Dominican Republic, not even when I criticized the expenditures of his son last year; I merely said that I did not think we ought to give him any more money, but I did not attack him personally, and I am not attacking him personally here—but I think it ill becomes a Member of the U.S. Congress to get up and say that if he, General Trujillo, had been born in the United States he would have been President. Then he went on to say that if he had been President there would be no cold war, no widespread communism that there is today, and from a taxpayer's standpoint there would have been no $300 billion national debt.

Now, as the Washington Post pointed out in its editorial, presumably that if the generalissimo had been the President of the United States and accomplished all this, that on the 7th day he would have rested.

Mr. REUSS. I thank the gentleman, and would point out that I have never on this floor criticized or even mentioned the head of state of the Dominican Republic. It is not my custom to speak critically of foreign heads of state here; it is only because the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW], has seen fit to make the address which he has made to the legislature of the Dominican Republic that I have felt it my duty to speak here this afternoon.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WITHROW. I shall answer what has been said on the floor, and I thank the gentleman for having written me informing me he was going to make this speech. First of all, I would like to say at this time that the House never asked me to do anything in order to get a seat on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The other thing I would like to point out is you are taking what I said out of context.

Mr. REUSS. The entire remarks are being placed in the RECORD. If the gentleman will ask unanimous consent that I may proceed, I will be delighted right now to read the entire verbatim transcript of the speech. The only reason I did not do so is that the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HOEVEN, earlier this afternoon pointed out to me that a policy meeting of his party, the Republican Party, was to be held, and in the interest of keeping the proceeding this afternoon short I did not read the entire transcript. But I shall be delighted not to object to the gentleman's unanimous-consent request, if he cares to make it, and I will read the entire verbatim transcript, word for word, as taken down by the court reporter in the Dominican Republic on February 7. That verbatim transcript was sent to the gentleman yesterday by me so that if the slightest comma was misplaced, he might give us notice.

Mr. WITHROW. I would like to inform the gentleman there was no court reporter there. The remarks that he has attributed to me here as my remarks were taken down by a newspaper. I have never defended a dictator but I think he has been a benevolent dictator, I think he has done a good job for those people. If it is treason to say that, I am guilty of treason.

Mr. REUSS. Nobody has suggested that the gentleman is guilty of treason. But let me say that if ever so much as a syllable, so much as a punctuation point, in the verbatim transcript of the gentleman's speech was wrong, I delivered it to the gentleman 24 hours ago so that he might have an opportunity to correct

it. The entire facilities of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are open to him to make the correction.

Mr. WITHROW. Your heart is bleeding for me, I know that, and I appreciate it. I would like to ask another question. Has the gentleman ever been to the Dominican Republic?

Mr. REUSS. No; I have never been to the Dominican Republic.

Mr. WITHROW. You talk as if you have not been there.

Mr. REUSS. The gentleman talks as if he had been.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I may say that the statement I read about Mr. WITHROW's remarks in reference to getting on the Committee on Foreign Affairs were not taken out of context. They were the complete statement as it appeared in this story, and it has to do with what he said about the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That is why I read the whole thing. The copy I have says that it is a true and exact copy of the complete context of the speech of U.S. Representative GARDNER R. WITHROW before the Dominican Congress in a joint session as it was reported in the Herald of the Dominican Republic. If the gentleman did not say this or if he did not get up there and criticize the Members of the Congress of the United States and the Congress of the United States and his own political party, then I think he owes it to the House to repudiate this story right here and now. If he did not say there are nitwits in Congress he should say that he did not make the statement. The only reason I did not file a resolution about that is because after reading his statement I decided he might be right. If he did not say so, I think he should say so right now and not say he is being quoted out of context, because I read the whole thing. I want to know who threatened him or what promise was made.

Mr. WITHROW. Nobody threatened me. I was not threatened by anyone.

Mr. HAYS. Did you make that statement before the Dominican Congress?

Mr. WITHROW. I will answer those questions when I want to answer them. I am not going to answer them on the spur of the moment. I received Congressman REUSS' letter this morning about 11:30, and I came over on the floor immediately. Now I have the speech that I gave down there.

Mr. HAYS. Will the gentleman answer one little question on the spur of the moment? Did you make this speech on the spur of the moment?

Mr. WITHROW. I made a speech but I never said there were nitwits elected to the Congress.

Mr. HAYS. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that and I hope that will be reported in the Dominican Republic.

Mr. WITHROW. I have been here for quite a while and I have always been honest with the Members of this House.

Mr. HAYS. Nobody is impugning the gentleman's honesty.

Mr. WITHROW. I believe I have their respect. We had a little controversy over the Dominican Republic before, and you, in a loud sort of a way——

Mr. HAYS. I will point out to the gentleman that we did not have any controversy over the Dominican Republic. But, since the gentleman has brought that up, I did object to the gentleman——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present. I think the folks ought to hear it.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR A. KNOX

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, last week the membership of the House of Representatives approved legislation known as the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959.

Since 1921 this area of taxation has posed a most difficult and perplexing problem. It is therefore appropriate for me to compliment my committee chairman and each fellow member of the committee who have labored so diligently and with such efficiency to prepare this legislation for consideration.

The insurance company of today is not the simple protective agency of yesterday, but rather today it serves its policyholders as bank and protection agency. The result has been that the savings operation has become so intertwined with the pure insurance function that it is difficult to determine who is the beneficiary of the investment income. The problem of taxing the company's income and not the income necessary to meet long-range contingencies and commitments is difficult of solution.

It is my belief that this legislation takes the most practical and effective approach to the problem. No longer will this industry be taxed by means of a fictitious formula that taxes investment income of a company even though that company sustained a net loss on its year's operation.

This bill, H.R. 4245, departs from the present inequitable system by including the various types of income in the tax base. The underwriting gains which were previously untaxed are now included in the tax base along with the free investment income and with capital gains.

Although I concur generally with the approach this legislation takes to the solution of the problem, it was with some hesitancy that I voted affirmatively. I question whether there has been sufficient consideration given to what the economic impact will be under circumstances of retroactively imposing such a substantial tax increase on this industry. We must be certain that this legislation will not result in such a burden as to discourage saving through the purchase of life insurance. It is essential to the future economic well-being of this country that our people are encouraged to provide for their own future security.

It must also be noted that the insurance industry is heavily taxed at the State level and the cumulative burden of all taxes must be weighed in considering the appropriateness of a particular tax.

It was for these reasons that I felt compelled to express my views on the possible ramifications of this bill. I am confident that during the legislation's further study in the Congress careful consideration will be given to these economic factors.

The Federal Budget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN E. WILLIS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the people know more about a balanced budget and deficit financing than we give them credit for. They know that from personal experience. For example, they know that when they live within their means, they are operating on a balanced budget. They know that when they spend more than they make, they are going into debt, which is exactly the same thing as deficit financing. There are a few of them who do not care one way or another, but most of them do. They know that their habits should not be more costly than their own purse can buy. And make no mistake about it, they expect the President and the Congress to find a way not to spend more money than the Government takes in. We will be hearing more and more about this subject, and so far as I am concerned, I am willing to stand up and be counted right now.

But first let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe in name calling. I want to express my personal views without regard to conservative, liberal, Democratic, Republican, or any other kind of partisan politics.

In my opinion, the most serious threat to our economy is inflation. Deficit spending breeds inflation and inflation in turn reduces the value of the dollar. In his History of the French Revolution, Carlyle once said, "You cannot quench fire with oil. You must choke a deficit or else it will swallow you." In short, I believe in and have made it a practice in my own way to vote against deficit spending and for a balanced budget. In fact, I believe we should try to go one step further. We should strive to spend less than we take in and apply the difference against the public debt, because I, frankly, do not see how we can hope to have a general tax reduction until that is done. If we cannot do it now, how can we expect to do it in case of a more serious national emergency.

Now, in Government as in business, a budget is composed of two parts, the income and the outgo. When the one is equal to the other, then the budget is in balance. But when the proposed expenditures exceed the anticipated revenues, then the budget is out of balance. We cannot have our cake and eat it too, and in this situation, in order to bring it back into balance, we must either reduce the expenditures or increase the taxes. That is exactly the position the President found himself in when he received the estimate of income and expenses from the Budget Bureau. In other words, the Budget Bureau estimated the outgo to be more than the income under all existing taxes, and they had to either trim down the expenses some more or propose new taxes. They chose to recommend new taxes. That is the hitch.

Let us take a look at the President's budget itself. We call it the budget for the fiscal year 1960, but it actually covers the period from July 1, 1959, to June 30, 1960. It is a very complex document, containing over 1,000 pages and weighing over 10 pounds. It provides for the operation and services of every branch of the Government in every congressional district and in every section of the country. We refer to it as the President's budget because in the final analysis, the occupant of the White House, whoever he may be, directs the policy of his administration and has the right on a broad scale to reduce or increase the expenditures of this or that department or function of our Government. We all know, however, that the President himself does not and cannot possibly be expected to prepare his budget. The job is done by the Bureau of the Budget, which is the right arm of the President. It is a big job, indeed, and a year round checking and bookkeeping operation. Every single item of proposed expenditure, and each and all demands made upon our Government must be weighed and considered, approved, increased, shaved down or disapproved. They cannot possibly please everyone. In the end, some people feel that the proposed expenditures are too low, while others, with equal sincerity, believe that they are too high; some people, or some sections in the country, are glad, some are half-pleased, some are displeased, and still others are downright mad. As I said, a few people just do not care, but most of them are dead serious in wanting to know at least one thing: does it balance? It is to these people that I address myself.

Well then, does this one balance? The answer is "Yes," provided the Budget Bureau has correctly estimated the expenses at $77 billion; and provided they have correctly estimated the revenues, under all existing taxes, at $76 billion, and provided further that Congress adopts their recommendations and imposes $1 billion of new taxes to make up the difference. In order to make my points clearer, I speak in round figures throughout.

I want to be more specific. After screening the demands of all the Federal departments and agencies, including requirements for public improvements, flood control, navigation, highways, public housing, veterans, welfare and social security, agriculture, postal services, the administration of justice, and the manifold other functions of our Government, the interest on the public debt and the staggering cost of our national defense, the Bureau of the Budget estimated that the expenditures for the next fiscal year, which actually covers the period from July 1, 1959, to June 30, 1960, will amount to about $77 billion. So much for the outgo.

Now let us consider the estimated income for the same period, July 1, 1959, to June 30, 1960.

For the information of Members of Congress and others, the Bureau of the Budget issued a pamphlet entitled "The Federal Budget in Brief." According to this pamphlet, the income of our Government from all sources and under all existing taxes for the fiscal years 1957, 1958, and 1959 was as follows:

Fiscal year:	Income (in billions)
1957 (July 1, 1956, to June 30, 1957)	$71
1958 (July 1, 1957, to June 30, 1958)	69
1959 (July 1, 1958, to June 30, 1959)	68

Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly obvious that if the business trend in the last 3 fiscal years should continue, the estimated expenditures for the next fiscal year, amounting to $77 billion, would far exceed the income. And if that should happen, the proposed budget of the President would be way out of balance. But in the pamphlet I refer to, the Bureau of the Budget states that "with continued vigorous economic recovery" the revenues during next fiscal year will amount to about $76 billion. Now the Bureau of the Budget has been operating as an agency of the executive department of the Government for a very long time. And I respect their expert opinion. They certainly are in a much better position than I am to make an educated guess about anticipated revenues. I am sure that they would not deliberately mislead Congress. In fact, it has been their practice to stay on the conservative side over the years. I know they are sincere, and I hope they are right. Nevertheless, their estimate of income is certainly based on an optimistic business outlook, and that is why I said that the budget, as presented, is in balance, "provided they have correctly estimated the revenues."

But let us assume that the estimates are correct and that the income from all sources and under all existing taxes will turn out to be $76 billion against their estimated expenditures of about $77 billion. At this point the budget is still out of balance, and, as I previously indicated, in order to bring it into balance, the President and his advisers had to either recommend trimming down the estimated expenses or increasing the revenues somehow to the tune of about $1 billion. Do you realize what $1 billion is? Let me illustrate. If you placed $1,000 bills one on top of the other, the stack would be as high or higher than the Washington Monument. Or put it this way. Using round figures again, only about 1 billion minutes have gone by since the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ. Take up your pencil and figure it for yourself.

In any event, in order to make up the difference between the income and the outgo, whatever that exact figure might be, the President wants Congress to make seven new tax adjustments.

But, Mr. Speaker, a rose by any other name would still smell the same. In plain language, they want Congress to impose a brand new tax on jet fuel, raise the general gasoline tax, raise the postal rates, raise the income tax of life insurance companies, raise the taxes on cooperatives, and reduce or juggle the 27½-percent depletion allowance, which is another name for raising the taxes on income derived from oil and gas. They also suggest an adjustment of other fees and charges so that persons receiving special services will more nearly pay the cost of those services. I do not know exactly what is meant by this particular item. I might be able to go along with the general idea, but I will want more information about it. In fact, all the proposals have been made in such very general terms that we will not know what each one means in dollars and cents until the administration bills are actually introduced.

I recognize that certain tax injustices have developed over the years and I believe that this should properly be the subject of a broad study by the Committee on Ways and Means, but I doubt that this can be done overnight, so to speak. I have great respect for the Committee on Ways and Means and if and as they make recommendations, I will most certainly consider them.

And I want to say that I, for one, applaud the President's determination to balance the budget. I am for it because I firmly believe in fiscal integrity. In short, I agree with the President on the necessity for a balanced budget but I disagree with him on his way of achieving it. He recommends that we do it by first increasing taxes, while I think we should first try to do it by reducing certain expenditures.

My policy will be this. I will study each item of expenditure and each item of appropriation as they are presented on the floor for debate. I realize full well that different people in my congressional district, or in any other given area for that matter, have different ideas about where to cut and we have to try to reflect the views of the majority. Even that becomes a difficult task at times, but we have to do the best we can under the circumstances existing when we cast our votes.

But when all my votes for expenditures are laid side by side with those for appropriations, they will spell out a balanced budget. In other words, I will not personally vote to spend more than we take in. And I think that, at least, is the general feeling of the people I represent. Just to give one example, I am quite sure that the people of my district would prefer for me to vote to cut down on foreign aid rather than to vote for an increase in the gasoline tax. As a matter of fact, I have always voted against all foreign aid. The President's budget calls for almost $4 billion for foreign aid. If we should eliminate this one item in toto, as I will vote to do, or if we even cut it in half, the budget would not only be in balance, without new taxes, but there would be enough left to boot to apply a sizable sum against the national debt.

The Cotton Textile Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK M. COFFIN
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, those of us who come from areas relying on the cotton textile industry are accustomed to two lines of reasoning: First, the industry is ailing and going downhill; and, second, measures seeking to assist the industry involve subsidies or other types of governmental assistance and should therefore be avoided.

Both statements ignore one vital phenomenon which affects no other industry in so great a degree as cotton textiles. I do not know of any other industry where our Government follows a policy of paying about one-fourth of the price of cotton going to an overseas manufacturer. Indeed, what the Government is actually doing is giving an overseas manufacturer a free bale of cotton for every three he buys. Think what our own manufacturers could do if one bale in four were free. As it is, however, not only must they pay the full price for all bales, but they have the doubtful pleasure of knowing that their taxes have helped pay for that extra fourth bale that is given to their competitors.

The recent news of an increase in the cotton export subsidy ran through all the cotton mills north and south like a wintry breeze. It was almost unbelievable that, at a time when the Congress has been working toward a lessening of this differential, the official policy of the U.S. Department of Agriculture has served to aggravate the situation, thus putting our domestic manufacturers at a greater disadvantage in competing with foreign manufacturers and contributing to unrest in cotton growing areas in other nations by further depressing the world market price.

On February 4, 1959, the Secretary of Agriculture announced that it will pay a subsidy of 8 cents per pound on cotton exports during the crop year beginning August 1, 1959. This is 1.5 cents per pound more than the export subsidy which the Department has been paying this year.

Under the program we will be furnishing foreign cotton mills with U.S. cotton at a price of 23.5 cents, while our own manufacturers will be paying 31.5 cents a pound for the same cotton. This will mean a 34-percent differential in raw material costs, to the detriment of American mills.

In announcing the projected price drop on export cotton, the Secretary of Agriculture served notice on foreign buyers that by holding off on purchases of U.S. cotton until after August 1, great savings could be realized. This reduces our exports and contributes further to cotton surpluses. It hurts the farmer, the exporter, and the manufacturer. Unless the administration is willing to modify its approach to this problem, Congress will have no alternative but to adopt legislation which will effectively protect domestic manufacturers in the pricing of domestic cotton.

Is It Evil To Own a Large Farm?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, propagandists are busy in an effort to build up resentment against a farmer because he owns or operates a sizable acreage. These people would lead one to believe that a large operation is wicked and evil since such farmers allegedly receive the major part of Government benefits.

If that argument were valid it could just as well be argued that the farm programs are just a dole or handout to farmers irrespective of the size of this participation by them.

A few days ago I received a letter from Mr. Lloyd Godley, of Osceola, Ark., on this subject. The writer of the letter is a farmer, general manager of the Mississippi County (Ark.) Production Credit Association, and one of the Nation's foremost agricultural leaders. His letter is recommended reading.

I am attaching also my reply to Mr. Godley's letter:

OSCEOLA, ARK., February 11, 1959.
Hon. E. C. "TOOK" GATHINGS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR "TOOK": Why is there such a persistent drive to sway public opinion on our farm problems by condemning larger than family-size farming operations?

It is distressing that some of our stanchest friends seem to have succumbed to the idea that bigness in agriculture is evil. They say that big farmers get most of the price support money, but ignore the fact that 20 percent of the farmers grow 80 percent of the crops.

Farmers, large or small, do not generally approve of discrimination because of the size of a farming operation. They feel that we should have a sound farm economic program, not a farm relief program.

Most people are aware of the fact that our Nation has been made great because of every man's privilege of becoming as big as his energy, inclination, and ingenuity will permit. They do not believe that the farmer should be singled out by his Government as being one entitled to less consideration than those of other economic groups.

A few days ago I was talking with a typical so-called family-type farmer and here is what he said. "My son likes farming and I would like to send him to an agricultural college for a degree in agriculture. He and I have talked it over and we have just about decided that it may be wiser for him or any other ambitious farm boy to prepare for some other field. Here is my son's thinking, and I agree with him, the Government will in the years to come limit the benefit of farm programs to small operators. In that case the ambitious farmer who wishes to fully apply his managerial ability will be materially handicapped by Government restrictions relative to the size of his farming operation."

I could not disagree with the thinking of this father and son.

Most certainly I do not wish to criticize those very fine and able Congressmen and Senators who are devoted to the cause of agriculture, but I do think it is a disservice to the cause of agriculture when farmers are divided as to the size of their operation and when one group is set apart as deserving of less consideration because of his apparent success.

This farmer's son could prepare to enter big business, big industry, or big labor without fear of economic restrictions or reprisals and with the knowledge that he would be permitted full exercise of his managerial and executive ability. But, not so in agriculture if limitations become law. It would be easy to understand if this were the enemies of agriculture advocating this policy, not the friends.

Our farm leaders who have joined themselves together for the purpose of formulating programs to present to the Congress are constantly haunted by the fear that program benefits will be limited to a certain size farming operation.

If we may console ourselves by the fact that no compulsory program has ever had limitations due to size of operation then we may be led to believe that none ever will.

On the other hand, if all big farmers were exempt from allotment compliance we would indeed be buried by surplus.

To be sure we farmers have much unfair competition but it doesn't come from the legitimate farmer. It comes from those who make their money in some other business and enter farming as a fascinating hobby.

If there can be any legal way, this type of farming should be eliminated but not at the expense of honest-to-goodness farmers who have through their own efforts built up a large farming operation.

No industrial corporation has ever had tariff benefits limited because of the size of the business, nor has any fast tax write-off or any other subsidy been limited to industry or business because of size—then why discriminate against agriculture.

What we need is farm legislation that will permit agriculture a fair share of the national income. It should not be tied in with social legislation.

When farm people have a stable expanding income consistant with the progress of the other segments of our economy, farmers will set and maintain their own social pattern which will not be inconsistent with the well-being and traditions of this Nation.

It is a fact that small farmers have made a mighty contribution to the social and economic structure of this Nation, but they have never been deprived by law from expanding to the full extent of their ability.

They should never be so handicapped.

Many farmers believe that the issue of "limitations" is the greatest stumbling block in the road to sound and permanent farm legislation.

I am writing this with the hope that a farmer's viewpoint may be of value to you in your deliberation on this vital issue.

With best wishes, I am

Sincerely,

LLOYD GODLEY.

FEBRUARY 19, 1959.

Mr. LLOYD GODLEY,
Osceola, Ark.

DEAR LLOYD: Your letter is greatly appreciated and so clearly depicts the valid and sound arguments in opposition to payment limitation movements which have grown up in recent years. I have in my file an earlier letter from you on this subject which I prize most highly. This story needs to be told and reiterated.

It is true that larger farm operators receive the greater return from benefits provided by the Government. The message is being related and emphasized as if such a person is a culprit, scoundrel, or grand rascal. His participation in these programs is greater since his contributions in volume output are larger. It is an effort to poison and prejudice the minds of the American people that the large farmer should be made smaller. That theory—if carried to its ultimate end conclusion—would mean that if a person had saved his money and lived frugally and acquired new holdings from time to time he would find himself confronted with a movement to split up his operations among his less fortunate brother farmers. That type of philosophy is not in keeping with the principles of equality of opportunity to the citizen. The incentive of the individual should be encouraged under our system.

You are right when you say that no effort is being made to penalize large industry. Subsidies for railroads are not being made on the basis of the length of the line or the amount of equipment and other properties that the railroads possess; subsidies to the airlines and steamship people have no such limitations. Fast tax writeoffs have benefited all size operators. Your letter is most convincing, plausible, and informative upon this subject; and I am grateful to you for writing me.

With personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Yours sincerely,

E. C. GATHINGS.

Railroad Retirement Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Several of the major features of this bill include: An increase in retirement and survivor annuities and pensions by 10 percent; an increase in unemployment benefits rates, and an extension of unemployment benefits periods beyond the 130 days allowed by present laws; and a reduction from 65 to 62 in the age at which spouses and women employees may receive annuities at a reduced rate.

The Railroad Retirement Act has been a great boon to the railroad people of this country, providing well deserved security in the years after they have left active railroad service. However, this legislation is now in need of amendment to keep it in tune with the times.

It is well known that in periods of rising prices such as we have had over the past few years, that persons on fixed incomes are most severely hurt. The increases granted to retired railroad employees have not kept pace with the increases in the cost of living.

I believe that this bill will provide the necessary liberalization in railroad retirement provisions and railroad unemployment insurance while, at the same time, by alterations in the financing of these benefits, insure the continuance of the program on a sound financial basis.

Estonian Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, during their entire modern history Estonians have enjoyed national independence for a very short time, for only two decades. After living under the mild sovereignty of the Swedes during the 16th and 17th centuries, and after enduring the oppressive regime of the Russian czars in the 18th and 19th centuries, early in the 20th they attained their freedom and national independence toward the end of the First World War. That was the culmination of their long struggles, and the realization of their national dream. When the autocratic Russian regime was shattered, they proclaimed their independence and on February 24, 1918, established the Estonian Republic. Thenceforth in the midst of hard but pleasant work, they all were happy and joyful in their homeland. And all seemed to be going well for about two decades. Then the evil forces of the world were let loose; the Second World War started, and the Estonians, with a host of other countries, saw the doom of their independent status as a nation and the loss of freedom as individuals. In 1940 Estonia was overrun by the Red Army and in July the country was annexed to the Soviet Union.

Since then, for almost two decades, Estonians have been suffering under totalitarian dictatorship, and have been bearing the brunt of alien philosophies imposed upon them by godless Communists. In this indescribable suffering all seems gloomy, and the immediate future does not look bright. But these courageous and tough fighters for freedom, long schooled in adversity, cling tenaciously to their ideals of freedom and never entertain any doubt about the victory of their righteous cause, the cause of freedom and independence. On this 41st anniversary celebration of their Independence Day we can heartily echo their genuine and patriotic sentiments and hope for the realization of their goal.

The Jewish Memorial Hospital

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT ZELENKO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. ZELENKO. Mr. Speaker, it is with great satisfaction that I speak again of the Jewish Memorial Hospital—one of the great voluntary health institutions of the city of New York and of the District which I have the honor to represent here.

This institution will observe the 54th year of its founding at a dinner to be held in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on Saturday evening, April 4.

This event, which draws the outstanding citizens from the great metropolis of New York, is one of the high points in our city's community life. Men and women who have demonstrated their civil leadership, and sense of philanthropic responsibility, overflow the dinner to mark their personal tribute to a rare hospital institution. I say rare, because along with its high and highly regarded services for the healing and health of all of the people of the area in which it is located, Jewish Memorial Hospital is noted, and distinctively so, as "The Hospital With a Smile."

Since its founding in 1905, the hospital has grown some 900 percent beyond its first modest beginnings. Yet community demands on the hospital continue to mount. As a result, a new building program is under way that will enlarge the hospital's facilities still more. This building program, developed under the leadership of Jesse H. Barkin, president of the Jewish Memorial Hospital board of trustees, promises to be a shining example of the American pattern of volunteer humanitarian achievement.

Mr. Barkin is fortunate in having associated with him a group of outstanding New York citizens, selfless in their devotion and generous with their time, money, and effort for the hospital.

Jewish Memorial Hospital looks ahead. As one aspect of its forethought, it constructed a special research and laboratory building several years ago in which research is being carried on today for advances in the medical and surgical achievements of tomorrow. A group of dedicated doctors, surgeons, technicians, and researchers are here gathered in an impressive human brotherhood of healing and mercy.

Outstanding in the work of this research laboratory is an extraordinary organization known as the Marcia Slater Society for Research in Leukemia. Its origin is itself a deeply stirring story of courage and aspiration. Its achievements are a unique expression of the human capacity to evoke creative values out of deep personal tragedy.

The Marcia Slater Society for Research in Leukemia was founded in 1950 following the death by leukemia of a child of 8 named Marcia Slater. In the clouded years before she passed into the Great Beyond, Jewish Memorial Hospital mustered every resource of medical skill to prolong her life. Outstanding in this effort was Dr. Harry Wallerstein, now the president of Jewish Memorial Hospital's medical board. So impressed were the parents and friends of the tragically ill Marcia, that they set out to organize a group that would contribute to the study of leukemia and, hopefully, learn to deal with this dread killer.

The group, which called itself the Marcia Slater Society for Research in Leukemia, is not composed of men and women of great wealth. On the contrary, here are average American men and women, with all of the responsibilities of earning a living, of maintaining a harmonious family life and of contending with the problems that face each and every one of us. But this condition does not prevent their fervent and enthusiastic support of a program to make possible substantial research in leukemia. So dedicated, so devoted was and is this group that, as of today, it has been able to contribute $90,000 to the research program in leukemia, headed by Dr. Harry Wallerstein.

Here I want to pay particular tribute to those who have inspired and guided its work.

Dr. Harry Wallerstein, himself, and the officers of the society, Miriam Kaufman, president; Helen Canter, vice president; Evelyn M. Riskin, treasurer; Florence Rosenwasser, financial secretary; Bea Rubine, recording secretary; Frances Edenberg, corresponding secretary; Edythe Willen, auditor; Evelyn Slater, honorary president; Dorothy Silverman, honorary past president; and Gussie A. Wallerstein, honorary vice president.

I believe that my colleagues in Congress agree with me in my regard for this organization of average American men and women, as a shining example of the best and noblest in our American tradition.

Estonian Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, Estonians are one of the smallest and bravest of the non-Russian nationality groups upon whom Soviet communism was forced in July 1940.

These sturdy and stouthearted people, living in their ancient homeland from time immemorial on the northeastern shore of the Baltic, have had difficulty in maintaining their national independence, yet they have never been completely subdued by their conquerors. For more than 200 years before the First World War their country was part of the Russian Empire, where they lived there under the oppressive regimes of the czars. Nevertheless they succeeded in maintaining their distinct national character and clung steadfastly to their common goal, that of attaining their independence. When the Czar of Russia was overthrown, they had their chance, and on February 24, 1918, they proclaimed their independence.

That was 41 years ago. For about two decades they enjoyed their richly deserved independence in their newly constituted Republic. They lost their independence early in the last war and since then have been suffering under the worst of tyrannies. Today, these helpless but not hopeless people bear the heavy yoke of their Communist taskmasters in the firm belief that in the end they will once more regain their freedom and independence. We in the free world, in observing the 41st anniversary of Estonian Independence Day, ardently join them in that expectation. We pray that they all will live to see that day.

Congress Should Have More, Not Less, Control Over TVA—H.R. 3460 and Similar Bills Should Not Pass

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, a reading of the record of TVA from its inception in 1933 discloses that TVA has engaged in a progressive assumption and usurpation of powers that Congress never intended it should have. In fact, TVA officials and its proponents have from time to time denied the authority and the intention to do the very things that were later assumed or claimed. Such an agency should have greater congressional control, not less.

It would take volumes on volumes to set forth all the various statements and claims that TVA and its proponents have made relative to the future programs or actions of TVA, and the record of failure to perform in accordance with such claims or contentions. A few of the more obvious failures of TVA to act in accordance with the expressions of its officials and proponents are here noted.

In regard to the cost of TVA, the author of the TVA bill in the House stated that the entire proposed TVA program could be completed for less than $150 million. An opponent who prophesied at the time that it would be a billion-dollar program was only half right. It now has cost $2 billion in money appropriated out of the U.S. Treasury, in addition to the loss of freedom and initiative of the people in the TVA region itself due to the autocratic power placed in the hands of a three-man board.

Surely an agency that has had almost unlimited and dictatorial control of the spending of over $3,760,000,000 from its inception to June 30, 1958, and whose annual gross income now approaches one quarter billion dollars, should have more congressional control, not less.

TVA's 14,600 employees are under the almost unlimited control of the three men who run TVA. It would seem more proper to provide that these 14,600 TVA employees come under the United States Civil Service Commission laws and regulations as do most Federal employees, rather than to continue or expand the almost unlimited control that three men now have over these TVA employees.

TVA DENIED IT PLANNED TO CONSTRUCT STEAM PLANTS

TVA told the U.S. Court of Appeals with reference to the Sheffield steam plant near Wilson Dam that was turned over to TVA:

> Said steam electric generating plant has not been and is not being operated and there is no plan or intention to operate said plant now or in the future, or to construct or operate any other steam electric generating plants.

This contention to a high U.S. court was made in order to obtain a favorable ruling on the question of the legality of TVA's operations and program. The record of failure on this point is highlighted by the later operation of the steam plant in question and the construction of many other steam electric plants by TVA, one of which is now boastfully claimed by TVA to be the largest steam electric plant in the world.

Such action clearly indicates that the people's representatives in Congress should have more, not less, control over the operations and expansions of the TVA power empire.

TVA told the U.S. Court of Appeals that TVA "has disposed of and will dispose of only such electric energy as is generated from waterpower inevitably created by the operations of the said dams for navigation and flood control and which is not needed for governmental purposes and which would otherwise be wasted."

Today more than 72 percent of the electric power TVA disposes of comes from steam electric plants This is another indication of why TVA cannot be trusted and should have more congressional control, not less.

TVA officials have gradually usurped or assumed a utility responsibility for the area in which they operate, and after such assumption try to claim that Congress by its action in providing the bond issue to purchase the Tennessee Electric Power Co. properties gave TVA such a utility responsibility.

This of course is not in keeping with the TVA position before the congressional investigation of TVA in 1938. At that time a high TVA official who was in charge of the negotiations for acquisition of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. system said in reply to a question as to whether TVA intended to purchase the Tennessee Electric Power Co. steam plants:

> In the case of the acquisition the plan has been that TVA would acquire the hydro plants in the Tennessee River system and the local public agencies would acquire the major steam plants.

And in regard to operation of these steam plants the same official also said:

> My point on it is this, that these steam plants are located near these large cities. TVA at the present time is not set up to operate these large steam plants where the local public agencies would have a substantial organization and crew, and very probably the operation of the steam plant would fit in better with the organization setup of those agencies than it would with ours.
> Take the Memphis situation, for example. There is a large steam plant at Memphis, which the city will probably purchase in case of an acquisition. Now, that plant would very probably be operated by the city to support our service to Memphis. In recognition of the support to our service to Memphis we would make an adjustment in our power bill. But the city would operate the plant, and I think that arrangement would be better than TVA operating the plant because we would have to maintain a steam plant personnel over in Memphis for that purpose alone. And the same thing would apply at Nashville.

Of course the record is clear on the failure of TVA to follow this claimed program for acquisition and operation of the utility company steam plants.

As a matter of fact, the contracts TVA executed with these local public agencies were "captive" contracts that prevented the very type of operation TVA told the Congress it intended to accomplish under the proposed bond issue amendment to the TVA Act. There can be no question that the distributors of TVA power such as Memphis, Nashville, Chattanooga, Knoxville, and others could have constructed steam electric plants to provide for the load growth of their respective areas that was in excess of the hydroelectric capabilities of the TVA system. Such operation could have been integrated with the TVA system for maximum benefit and economy.

TVA officials also told the Congress that the TVA power contracts with the industrial customers provided for cancellation and utilization of such power for the preference customers of TVA.

I can find no record of any cancellation of such contracts in accord with these TVA statements. In fact TVA has, over the years, steadily promoted and increased the sale of power to industry.

This is but another example of why TVA cannot be trusted with more corporate power but should have greater congressional control.

TVA officials have from time to time attempted to claim that they have not encouraged industry to locate or move to the TVA territory. Yet a TVA Director early in TVA existence made it quite clear that TVA did have a policy or intention to promote such industrial expansion in the TVA area. He said in a speech:

> I am very definitely of the opinion that it is the Authority's duty to encourage and stimulate the growth of large-scale industry in the Tennessee Valley area. We are making provision for one of the largest hydroelectric developments in the world, with a potential 3 million horsepower available. We are expending and expect to expend, millions upon millions of dollars in construction activities, all looking toward the development of more and more power. Although we are bending every effort to greatly increase the use of electricity in the home and on the farm, it is obvious that only a large-scale industrial expansion will absorb the great pool of power which is thus being created. As we lay our plans for developing this cheap power in great quantities, it seems to me to be mandatory that we also lay plans for utilizing it in an industrial expansion program.

And a few years later at a congressional hearing this same TVA Director said:

But industries don't set themselves up in a region automatically. There must be some organizing force, with technical and research facilities. We believe it is appropriate that some of this technical and research work should be undertaken by the Tennessee Valley Authority as an agency of all the people.

One could spend a full year in going over the thousands and thousands of pages of TVA record of its claims and contentions in public speeches, releases, and congressional testimony and the record of later failure to act in compliance with one after another of the earlier claimed actions, programs, and policies. This record gives abundant reason why TVA cannot be trusted with more corporate power but should have greater and more strict congressional control than it has had in the past.

The three TVA directors now have more power than three good men should want or more than three bad men should ever have. The present congressional control of TVA as now interpreted by TVA and as acquiesced in by some committees of Congress gives them almost unlimited control over the spending of nearly one-quarter billion dollars a year. To relieve them of even the present limited control should be unthinkable to any representative of the American people who has sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States and its American form of government. Steps should be taken to reestablish the congressional controls that are inherent under the Constitution.

The Constitution of the United States provided for three separate branches of government. This was to act as a system of balances and checks. The people's representatives in Congress were given a most important task of writing the laws for the executive department to administer. The Constitution also provided for the House of Representatives to initiate the revenue measures needed to provide the funds necessary for the operations of the Government. This authority to provide revenues and the authorization and appropriation of the funds needed to carry out the various acts of Congress was the check on the operations of the executive department through control of the purse strings. To relinquish this inherent control as provided for by the Constitution would be a betrayal of the oath of office to uphold the Constitution. It is quite clear that under H.R. 3460 and similar bills the legislative branch would be relinquishing its responsibility to maintain the check provided for by the framers of the Constitution. TVA needs more control by the people's representatives in Congress, not less.

Last year in the discussion of H.R. 8002, Congressman after Congressman stood on the floor of the House to say that there was a great need for more control by the Congress on the funds being expended by the executive department. Certainly this need for greater congressional control applies to TVA as much, if not more so, than to any other executive department of the Government.

If TVA had operated in the manner in which its officials initially told the Congress it was going to operate, then there would be less need to insist on greater control. But after 20-odd years of progressive failure to so operate and the gradual but continuing usurpation and assumption of powers not intended by the Congress, it is time to call a halt. TVA needs more congressional control, not less.

Under unanimous consent, I include along with my own remarks, an editorial from the Argus, of Rock Island, Ill., dated December 1, 1958:

TVA, 25-YEAR FRAUD

One of the largest and most amazing projects of the 20th century, the Tennessee Valley Authority, is starting on its second quarter-century.

Built at the taxpayers' expense, at a total cost of $1.5 billion, it is the Nation's largest power generating enterprise.

It buys more coal than any enterprise in America. It generates more power annually than all of France. It is now studying the possibilities of utilizing atomic power.

Yet when the TVA act was established, power wasn't even mentioned in the purpose preamble. The whole project was put over, and was approved by the U.S. Supreme Court, as a flood-control scheme.

It is concerned also with navigation, develops fertilizer and reforests eroded areas.

Originally intended to utilize hydroelectric power, it gets 75 percent of its electricity from steamplants—an aim originally disavowed.

It has the backing of hot-eyed southern conservatives who receive its cheap power at the expense of the rest of the Nation, of wild-eyed radicals in the North and of plain and fancy crackpots everywhere.

Norman Thomas, the Socialist leader, called it the only genuine socialistic measure of the New Deal.

Intended to serve electricity only to valley homes and farms, it distributes 51 percent of its power to U.S. defense agencies.

And it isn't satisfied with that. It seeks the authority—which was denied in the last session of Congress—to issue bonds for the construction of more plants.

It disavows any intentions to expand, but Philip Sporn, head of the American Electric Power Co., says a careful study of its proposal shows it would be able to take in 25,000 more square miles—a 30 percent increase—where private utilities now operate, and that it might go even farther.

That would be fully in accord with TVA's history.

It can move with confidence because it has a tremendous tax advantage over the private utilities. The latter pay 23.4 percent of their revenue from electric operations to State and Federal Governments. TVA pays 5 percent to local and State governments and nothing to Washington, though it has returned $250 million on its original investment, at the rate of 4 percent.

TVA paid only $4,148,000 in taxes in 1956, last year for which figures are available. But it did better than some Government power schemes at that. The Hoover Dam project pays $600,000 a year to Nevada and Arizona, but all other Federal power projects pay no taxes. If they were taxed at the rate of private utilities, they would pay a total of $82,523,610 into all governments.

What they fail to pay has to be made up by taxpayers in all parts of the country. As one utility executive put it, TVA's waters flow through three States and drain the other 45.

And TVA uses its 4-to-1 tax advantage to club the private companies out of existence.

This will continue as long as the American people, through their Congress, allow TVA to get away with it.

The private companies are asking that TVA be sold off to private and municipal interests. But TVA is still fighting to expand and will renew its bonding request in the next session of Congress.

There is a big principle involved in this unfair advantage which TVA is allowed to use against private companies. Congress ought to stop it.

Even if there were no such principle, the Nation as a whole should be tired of subsidizing the relatively small area which uses cheap TVA power. If private companies were operating throughout this area, Federal tax money would be swelled and the load on the rest of the Nation would be reduced accordingly.

TVA is a fraud against free enterprise and a fraud against the Nation's taxpayers.

Time To Repeal Telephone Excise Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE S. McGOVERN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation designed to repeal the excise tax on telephone service. The 10-percent sales tax on telephone users was levied during World War II as a temporary measure to reduce the load on overburdened telephone facilities and to raise funds for financing the war effort. The original purposes of this tax have long since faded from the scene, and yet this burdensome tax remains.

It may be argued that all taxes are burdensome, but that they are necessary to finance the vital services provided by the Federal Government. However, the tax on communications facilities is particularly severe, and I believe unfair, because it is a regressive sales tax which is imposed on everyone alike without reference to ability to pay. I have always opposed the use of a sales tax where it was not designed to fulfill a specific need.

Now, Federal sales taxes are levied on luxury items such as jewelry, liquor, and nightclub entertainment, and these I believe are well justified. But certainly one cannot put telephone service in the same category as these luxury items. Telephone service is a public utility of the same nature as electricity, gas, and water on which there are no Federal excise taxes.

This tax is also illogical in view of the Federal Government's efforts to promote the extension of telephone coverage through the telephone program of the REA. This program has greatly benefited the rural people of our Nation. But one should note that over 40 percent of our farm families today are still without the benefit, indeed the vital necessity, of telephone service. It is time to repeal this excise tax which runs directly counter to the stated aims of the Federal Government to promote telephone service.

Senator Hayden Views the Budget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEWART L. UDALL
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, the senior Senator from my State, the Honorable CARL HAYDEN, last week began his 48th consecutive year of service in the Congress, a record unequaled by any person since the founding of our Republic. In addition, since March 4, 1927, Senator Hayden has been a member of the Appropriations Committee of the other body, and thus has participated in the preparation of more appropriations than any other Member of the Congress.

In my opinion, Senator HAYDEN's wide experience as a legislator and the deep insight he has acquired over the years into fiscal matters makes his views unusually valuable in analyzing the present budget pending before the Congress. Last week there appeared in some Arizona newspapers a statement by the Senator regarding the controversy over Federal fiscal policies. Mr. Speaker, I believe Senator HAYDEN's perspective on the budget will be of interest to many of our colleagues, and consequently I am inserting the full text of his statement below:

I can think of no better way to begin a prompt response to your letter of January 29, and the attached editorial than to ask you to look over the enclosed copy of The Federal Budget in Brief for the fiscal year beginning on the first of next July, which is just off the press. The details set forth in the pamphlet should be helpful to you in appraising the financial problem with which the Congress is faced.

At page 18 is a breakdown of the $45,805 million for the costs of major national security which requires 59.5 cents out of the taxpayer's dollar. Paying for the cost of past wars by benefits to veterans, p. 30, and interest on the public debt, p. 32, requires an additional 17.1 cents or a total of over 76 cents of high priority demands against his dollar. Add to that about 5.4 cents for welfare costs, p. 26, and 2.2 cents to maintain the general Government, p. 34, where there is no prospect of reduction, leaves a margin of 16 cents out of which, with difficulty, some cuts could be made.

Only a small part of the $45 billion requested by the President for national security would be required if we could live our own lives in our own way without regard to what is being done in the rest of the world. But to do so we would have to ignore completely the fact that Russian controlled communism is an actual menace which must be met by the free world being prepared to either win a war against it or by being so strong that the dictators in Moscow will be afraid to start a war.

So much has happened in the meantime that there is no possible way to get Government back where it was intended to be—in 1776. We now live in a nation where many men, from the Revolution to this day, have been perfectly willing to give up their lives ahead of time to make our Nation free and to keep it free. That very freedom has made it possible to create such favorable living conditions that the average American can now expect to live 20 years longer than he could hope to do when I was born some 80 years ago. That there is an ever increasing number of older people who are no longer capable of supporting themselves is a fact from which we cannot escape. The present social security system and the other welfare activities undoubtedly have their defects, for which time and experience will find a remedy; but something very much like them just has to be in existence, and Congress will do well to hold what they will continue to cost close to 5 cents out of the taxpayer's dollar.

The objective of all Federal aid for the construction of highways is to make it possible to move people and things from where they are to where they are needed in the least time and at the least cost. It is a capital investment which is certain to pay good dividends. To supply the money required to build the needed highways, Congress has provided that the receipts from the Federal excise taxes on gasoline, motor oil, automobiles and accessories shall be deposited in a trust fund in the Treasury, to be available only for the construction and improvement of highways. Since the highway users rather than the general taxpayers pay their costs, highway funds are not included in the Budget.

The tabulation on page 58 of the Budget pamphlet shows that during the New Deal from 1933 to 1940 the public debt was increased by $20,429 million. From 1941 to 1946, the World War II period, the public debt mounted rapidly from $48,961 million to a peak of $269,422 million. The Budget was balanced in 1947 and 1948 with resulting debt reductions, but the costs of the fighting in Korea again caused deficits and there were no payments on the national debt until 1956 and 1957. Expenditures due to the cold war are the primary cause of the existing deficit.

I point out these figures to indicate the situation with which the Congress is faced. The one sure way to balance the budget is to increase the rates of Federal taxation, but nobody wants to pay more taxes. The Constitution provides that all revenue legislation originate in the House of Representatives. The indications are that the Committee on Ways and Means, which reports revenue bills to that body, will not do more than recommend the enactment of legislation designed to plug loopholes in the existing tax laws which may possibly produce about a billion dollars in additional revenue. That sum will not go very far in taking care of an estimated deficit which could amount to over $10 billion if business conditions do not improve as the President has predicted that they will. We can all join in the hope that he has made a good guess.

Except in time of war, Congress has never, during my service as a member of the Appropriations Committee, granted to any President as much money as he asked for in his annual Budget estimates. At the last session of Congress the appropriations were $600 million less than the Budget requests.

Installation Banquet Veterans of World War I, U.S.A., Boston Naval Shipyard Barrack No. 1240, Boston, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include herein part of an address delivered by me at the installation banquet conducted by the Veterans of World War I of the U.S.A., Boston Naval Shipyard Barrack No. 1240, held at the Linwood Grille, near Fenway Park in Boston, Mass., on Monday evening, February 23, 1959. Outgoing Comdr. Anthony D. Tieso officiated as the toastmaster of the evening, and the welcoming remarks were given by Department Commander Melvin D. Eddy. The installation of the newly elected officers was conducted by Department Senior Vice Commander Frank Farnham. The newly elected Comdr. William Francis Cooney extended the thanks of the organization to all invitees and the members, and presented an appropriate gift to Past Department Commander Francis W. Powers, and Department Commander Melvin D. Eddy:

It was George Washington who recommended that all officers who should continue in service to the end of the Revolutionary War should be entitled to half pay during life.

The Congress took favorable action on his recommendation.

We have come a long way since those days, regarding the coverage and the substance of pensions for veterans.

In spite of the fact that there is a movement under way—in 1959—to renege on the Nation's obligation to its veterans.

Those who are conducting this campaign do not dare to make a frontal attack for they know it would arouse a storm of opposition.

Instead, they are trying to divide the veterans by making a distinction between needy and nonneedy veterans in order to promote confusion and dissension. This is the opening wedge to reduce present pensions, and to throw a permanent roadblock in the way of pensions for all honorably discharged veterans of World War I which they see coming up over the horizon.

Unfortunately, many corporations and wealthy individuals seem to have persuaded the President that the budget must be balanced at all costs at the expense of our missile and space programs, the economic expansion of our country, and the American tradition of providing pensions for its ageing veterans.

These are the very same people who solemnly asserted that "nothing is too good for our boys" back in 1917 and 1918.

But today they want to forget those assurances and those promises.

During the very month that they honor the birthdays of two great Presidents they conveniently overlook George Washington's recommendations, and they avoid Abraham

Lincoln's reminder that we must "care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan."

But no matter how hard they try, no matter what devious techniques they employ they cannot get around the precedent, and the moral obligation of providing pensions, that are deeply rooted in our history.

The first national pension law was passed by the Continental Congress on August 26, 1776. Every officer, soldier, or sailor losing a limb in any engagement, or being so disabled in the service of the United States as to render him incapable of earning his livelihood, was promised half pay for life, or during disability.

The Revolutionary service pension law of 1818, introduced a new principle into this field of legislation. Before this time, disability was the firm requirement for the payment of any pension. With the new law, mere service in the Armed Forces, together with poverty, became the basis for entitlement.

Congress adopted a pure service pension schedule for the Revolutionary War survivors, on June 7, 1832. This act granted full pay for life to veterans who had served a minimum of 2 years.

The Mexican War Pension Act of 1887 granted a pension, if the veteran was suffering from disabilities to a pensionable degree. Veterans 62 years of age or older, were entitled to a disability pension, regardless of any disability.

The trend was plain to see. Congress was becoming more liberal with the experience of each successive war.

In the debate on the Mexican War Pension Act, Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, pleaded for uniformity, for consistency of action on the part of Congress. He explained that if the Government were bound as a matter of principle, to pension soldiers or sailors who do not need a pension, and who are under no disability, then it is a universal principle, and, as such, the veterans of all wars are entitled to the pension. Enactment of the bill, said the Senator, would very shortly compel the Congress to take the next step—a pure service pension for the Civil War veterans.

The Mexican War Pension Act was debated for 3 years, but logic and honor finally prevailed, and Congress passed the bill in January of 1887.

The Dependent Pension Act of 1890 was a service-pension law. Pensioners, however, were required to demonstrate their inability to perform manual labor as a means of supporting themselves. Because of this strange twist, the law spawned many abuses, and gave rise to much dissatisfaction.

Widespread agitation led to the act of May 11, 1912, setting up a formula whereby the Civil War veteran must have served at least 90 days in that conflict, and that he must be 62 years of age or older. The payments, provided for on a graduated scale according to length of service, were increased by subsequent legislation.

The act of June 5, 1920, was entitled "An act to pension soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, the Philippine Insurrection, and the China Relief Expedition."

It provided that any such veteran who has reached the age of 62 years shall, upon making proof of such fact, be placed upon the pension roll.

As for pure service pensions, the Spanish-American War is the most recent conflict where such provisions have been authorized by the Congress. Obviously, the veterans of World War I are next in line for this entitlement.

When Congress passed a bill to provide adjusted compensation for the veterans of 1917–18, it was vetoed by President Harding on September 19, 1922. In the message explaining his action, the President was looking to the future when he said that it is inevitable, as the years pass, that pension provision for World War veterans will be made, as it has been made for those who served in previous wars.

That prophecy was made over 36 years ago.

When we average out the length of time that the veterans of five previous wars in American history—up to and including the Spanish-American War—had to wait before service pensions were authorized, we find that it takes nearly 43 years.

We, the veterans of World War I, with over 40 years behind us, are getting close to the time of our entitlement.

When we consider that our honored senior, the Spanish-American War veterans, only had to wait 22 years for their pensions, it would appear that favorable action on our claim cannot be delayed much longer.

In the last session of the Congress, when my bill to provide a Federal charter for our organization was being debated, there were a few who opposed the bill. They insisted that our group was organized for the sole purpose of "lobbying through Congress a general pension bill that would provide $100 monthly to all World War I veterans regardless of need or length of service beyond 90 days."

I objected to that general accusation, pointing out that our organization serves the social and fraternal needs of its members. It also makes a positive contribution to every community in which there is a barrack, by its example of good citizenship, and by its perpetuation of those ideals that give young Americans in every generation, the faith and the courage to work for, and if necessary to fight in the defense of our freedoms.

But as to the charge that we are seeking a pension I say, "So what?"

There is nothing sudden or surprising in such a proposal—more than 40 years after World War I, and following a precedent that was firmly established long ago.

We believe that the veteran who is 62 years of age or older is entitled to a pension of $100 per month upon proof of age and honorable service, as a matter of right.

We are confident that this formula is the simplest and fairest method by which the Nation's obligation to the aging veterans of World War I will be honored.

In the school of practical experience, we have learned that few people in positions of leadership and influence showed any interest in our objective, until our organization was founded. Its rapid growth within the period of several years, has opened the eyes of our legislators, and is reminding a grateful, but sometimes absent-minded nation, that the pension issue is approaching decision day.

We are building unity and strength and inspiring comradeship through our membership in the Veterans of World War I of the U.S.A. We realize that only by such mobilization of our forces, directed toward the goal of a pension for all veterans of that conflict, can we win to our side, the public support that is necessary for victory in this campaign.

That is why we attack the administration's sly proposal, whereby the benefits for needy veterans—covering both compensation and pensions—might actually be increased.

No self-respecting veteran is opposed to additional aid for our needy comrades.

But we resent the deception inherent in this proposal.

Under the guise of helping the neediest veterans, it seeks, eventually, to determine eligibility on the basis of need alone, and thus completely undermine the obligation to provide a pure service pension to all aging veterans.

It is a clever maneuver, but it does not fool us.

We will not permit this administration to turn back the clock.

An old trick, being dusted off for use again, is to scare the public by estimating the cost of veterans' benefits some years from now. But this one-sided slanting of the facts fails to mention the mortality rates.

There are few survivors of the Spanish-American War.

The ranks of World War I veterans have been thinned in the space course of 40 years. Even the veterans of World War II are beginning to decline in number. In any case, about 22 more years must pass before they, in turn, become eligible for pensions.

It is no coincidence, therefore, that the administration and its big business advisers would like to readjust the Nation's pension program.

It is designed to block the veterans of World War I.

We would like to believe that it is motivated by fear of our growing strength, and that it merely represents a last-ditch effort to stop or slow down our drive.

That is only true in part.

They have had this idea in the back of their minds for a long time.

Some years after every war, when they think that people have forgotten the promises that were made in time of national emergency, certain financial interests always attempt to sabotage veterans' benefits so that they can keep more for themselves.

Under the current excuse of balancing the budget they believe that the opportunity they have been waiting for has arrived.

But the people on November 4, 1958—and in no uncertain fashion—demonstrated that they are in no mood for the Federal Government to abandon its responsibilities.

As employees of the Boston Naval Shipyard you are well aware of other moves they would like to make in the name of economy.

If they had their way, everything would be farmed out to private contractors—including the U.S. Navy, the Veterans' Administration hospitals, the civil service, and perhaps the Government itself.

If they had their way.

But the people have the final authority over their representative form of government. As long as we have truly enterprising organizations like the Veterans of World War I of the U.S.A., the economizers will not be able to default on their obligations.

We know that we are on the right course, and we intend to follow it until we reach our goal.

Civil Affairs and Military Government Combat Support Axioms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 24, 1959

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include an article which appeared in the January 1959 issue of the Military Review, U.S. Army Command and General Staff College publication, as a supplement to "CAMG Operations in Atomic Age Warfare," which appeared in the January 1958 issue of the same publication.

This splendid contribution entitled "CAMG Combat Support Axioms" was written by our distinguished junior Senator, STROM THURMOND, brigadier general, U.S. Army Reserve:

CAMG COMBAT SUPPORT AXIOMS

(By Brig. Gen. STROM THURMOND, U.S. Army Reserve)

(This article supplements "CAMG Operations in Atomic Age Warfare" written by Brig. Gen. STROM THURMOND and published in the January 1958 issue of the Military Review—Editor.)

The primary objective of civil affairs and military government operations (CAMGO) is to provide CAMG combat support. Toward this end, all energies, all actions, and all thought must be focused.

For this reason, CAMGO personnel devote themselves to acquiring a more specific, a more practical understanding of the combat commander's needs and problems and of the CAMG support that they can give him to assist in accomplishing fully the combat mission which has been assigned to him.

Before proceeding it would be well to decide what is meant by the term "CAMG combat support."

Referring to the "Dictionary of U.S. Army Terms," published by the Department of the Army in November 1953, as Special Regulations 320-5-1, we find that combat support is defined as: "operational assistance furnished combat elements."

After considering also the definition, therein, of such other terms as combat element, tactical element, and tactical troops, the following synthesis is submitted:

CAMG combat support is CAMG operational assistance furnished in a combat operation. CAMG troops provide CAMG operational assistance in direct support of combat troops, and are engaged under a combat commander, to operate as a part of his unit in combat.

COMMUNISM

Another basic CAMGO objective is to support and implement our national policies. Foremost of these policies is to combat and neutralize Communist social and political orientation of an area liberated by military force from Communist control.

The combat commander, as the one personally responsible for achieving CAMGO objectives, must be fully cognizant of these political military objectives of the Armed Forces of our country. He is the one who must constantly consider the human, political, and economic aspects of the area of his combat operations. The CAMG organization at his disposal is the instrument with which he removes or neutralizes all Communist influences in areas occupied by the military forces he controls. Any neglect of this responsibility will cause a vacuum quickly filled by Communist-oriented policy.

Of value in this connection is a little-known study of the 3 years of intensive Communist CAMG planning and subsequent occupation of a community entitled The Reds Take a City: The Communist Occupation of Seoul, by John W. Riley, Jr., and Wilbur Schramm, and published in 1951.

It is evident that our own CAMG planning must include a full comprehension of Communist CAMG planning. As a minimum, our CAMG planning must be directed at neutralizing the effectiveness of Communist aggressive efforts.

Furthermore, we must be constantly vigilant in our awareness that, as an instrument of foreign policy, CAMG is for us as it is for the Communists a weapon for waging war. It is an adjunct to other military weapons, perhaps, but, nevertheless, an essential military accessory for winning not only the war, but also the peace.

MILITARY VERSUS CIVIL AUTHORITY

Still another basic objective of CAMG operations is to provide for the early transfer of responsibility from the military commander to a designated civil agency of government.

CAMGO personnel are not engaged in social or economic experiments or studies for their own delectation or for academic professional interest.

The CAMGO job is to get things done as expeditiously as possible, to achieve actual military operational objectives, and to withdraw as soon as the military operational need has been met.

The pace is quick, not leisurely.

It must be kept in mind that prolonged military occupation is not the task before us.

TRANSFER TO CIVIL CONTROL

In order to facilitate the smooth transfer of control, civilian organizations under military supervision should be introduced early in the more stable parts of the area of operations and gradually replace specialized CAMG units and activities.

It is a cardinal rule, though, that there cannot be divided responsibility for the control of an area. Either the civil or the military authority must control the area. The agencies of either, however, can be used to support the other before and after the transfer of control, which must be accomplished smoothly, whether control is being transferred from civil to military authority or from military back to civil authority.

Historical examples of civilian organizations which served under military control are the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) in World War II and the International Cooperation Administration (ICA) in Korea.

Such civilian organizations, under the control of the theater army commander, and in turn under the supervision of his G5, definitely reduce the requirement of CAMGO personnel. CAMG units replaced move forward to augment the CAMG combat support units.

INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS

The remaining objective basic to CAMG operations is to comply with international treaties, agreements, or customary law.

For this reason, among others, there is in the modern nuclear age army a fifth general staff section concerned with all military-civil matters including the government, economy, inhabitants, and institutions in areas where U.S. Armed Forces are employed.

This insures that the combat commander is properly advised of his responsibilities, of the limitations on his courses of action, and of his capabilities deriving from political, economic, and social factors.

In his estimates of the combat situation, the combat commander carefully weighs these civil affairs and military government factors along with those dealing with personnel, intelligence, operations, and logistics.

The combat commander's decisions are influenced not only by his own and the enemy's relative combat power and disposition of forces, and not only by such factors as weather and terrain, but also by civil conditions in the area of his combat operations.

CAMG ACTIVITY

The CAMG activity is not new to the Army; only the organization of that activity is fairly recent.

Our CAMG experiences during World War I, and the preceding foreign military engagements of our Armed Forces, strongly indicated early in World War II the urgency and importance of organizing the CAMG activity that inevitably accompanies combat operations.

The scope of the CAMG activity is vast; the details of possible actions are numerous; and volumes could be written on each functional segment of the CAMG activity.

Because generalizations often seem vague, there is a need to search assiduously for clear, complete axiomatic statements to identify the elements of CAMG activity.

Concrete definitions are needed, sufficiently comprehensive in scope and in conveying understanding, of the practical part performed by CAMGO personnel as an operational element in the combat commander's organization.

Toward this end, axioms of CAMG combat support will be explored in an effort to determine how to achieve the basic objectives of CAMG operations previously mentioned.

Were warfare conducted in an arena set apart, such as the jousts of medieval knights, or as in many modern military maneuvers on military reservations, the combat commander could limit his concern to the factors of terrain and weather and the dispositions of friendly and enemy forces, their firepower, and capabilities. However, this is not the way it actually happens on the fields of battle.

Wherever we fight there are people, except perhaps in certain parts like the interior of deserts, at sea, or in an arctic region. It is because people interfere with war and war interferes with people that military commanders must consider the effect on projected combat operations of people, their actions, attitudes, institutions, and resources.

COMBAT COMMANDER RESPONSIBLE

Independence of action often results in the belief that subordinates concerned with particular CAMG matters are responsible for CAMG operations.

This is far from true and we must reemphasize again that the responsibility for CAMG operations is lodged only in the military commander of the area to whom CAMG authority has been delegated, whoever he may be, and regardless of whatever other concerns he may have.

The CAMG mission is part of the combat commander's mission. He must accomplish it even without using the CAMGO personnel and units specifically designated and available to him.

The CAMG organization assists the combat commander as any other service assists him in its particular sphere, but he is responsible.

Specifically trained CAMGO personnel, backed by CAMG organizations extending from the front to the rear through all the echelons of command, increase the combat commander's CAMG capability many hundredfold.

And, what is equally important, the combat commander is not compelled to divert from combat tasks personnel whose special training and competence is needed elsewhere to engage with the enemy.

COMBAT ELEMENT

It is the combat element which first contacts the civilian element upon the initial entry of our Armed Forces into enemy-held territory. It is the combat commander who first establishes the military control which must later be transferred to a civil agency.

The manner in which the people are handled at this early moment by the combat commander determines their first and most lasting attitude toward our Armed Forces. That attitude may become actively hostile or passively neutral. On the other hand, that attitude may be cultivated to become one of cooperation and, perhaps, even result in active assistance to the operations of the combat commander.

In view of the tremendous drain upon our own resources of modern atomic age warfare, it is essential that maximum utilization be made of the resources, including manpower, in areas where our Armed Forces are employed.

While it is true that international law requires the combat commander to restore and maintain public order and safety and to provide for the well being of the inhabitants of an area coming under his military control, the combat commander can do this in such a way as will contribute to his combat success.

CONVERSION PROCESS

The conversion of formerly enemy-held territory to reinforce and even augment the commander's combat power, in terms of resource utilization, is a significant aspect of CAMG combat support.

A paradox arises, however, in this CAMG conversion process. In order to exploit efficiently and effectively the resource potential in support of combat operations, it is not only necessary but also desirable to comply with the provisions of international law regarding restoring and maintaining public order and safety and providing for the well-being of the inhabitants.

In the resulting climate of good will, CAMG personnel, by working through civil officials, can make labor available for building military roads, bridges, warehouses, bunkers, and other facilities. They can locate and cause to be utilized for military purposes sawmills, stone quarries, workshops, pure water sources, stockpiles of construction materials, raw and processed materials, and many other civilian supplies, services, and facilities.

CAMG WEAPON

In the search for weapons of greater combat effectiveness, it is found that the CAMG weapon, as an instrument of the foreign policy of our Government, has proved itself on many battlefields throughout the world. It delivers on the ground, in the combat environment, an augmentation of combat power—in terms of usable resources—of tremendous magnitude.

Every person, organization, and echelon in the military structure, from the front to the rear, is required to contribute to the support of combat operations. This is equally true of the CAMG organization, and all CAMG actions must be directed toward this common goal, even at the expense, if necessary, of long-range rehabilitation and reconstruction programs in rear areas.

PERSONNEL COMPETENCE

It is of primary importance not only to have the CAMG organization, as such, but also to have the technological and professional competence of CAMGO personnel brought to peak efficiency for functioning in the combat environment.

Because CAMG concerns primarily are operational in nature, it is necessary that CAMGO personnel be thoroughly grounded in the various aspects of military science and tactics. To perform their part in combat operations, CAMGO personnel must have a comprehensive knowledge of the functions of the G3 section. Only in this way can they understand how the G5 section plays its operational role in the integrated staff of the combat commander.

The precept of Thomas Paine unqualifiedly applies: "Where knowledge is duty, ignorance is a crime."

It is the duty of every CAMG officer to qualify himself fully as an alter ego to the combat commander, capable of contributing to estimates of the combat situation and of participating in the formulation and implementation of combat decisions.

COMBAT SUPPORT TASKS

The exploration for axioms of CAMG combat support reveals that there are certain actions which are conditional, while there are others which recur in all cases. It may be concluded from this that CAMG combat support has two categories of tasks—conditional and recurring.

Conditional tasks are such as arise out of U.S. policy with regard to a particular area and the limitations imposed by the natural conditions of the area.

Recurring CAMG combat support tasks, on the other hand, may be defined, in general, as gaining assistance and avoiding interference of the inhabitants, their economy, and institutions in areas where U.S. Armed Forces are engaged in combat.

More specifically stated, recurring CAMG combat support tasks fall into six additional categories:

1. Civil conditions: Preventing and suppressing disease, starvation, unrest, and other conditions which derive from combat relationships and which would handicap or obstruct tactical and logistical operations, and combating enemy efforts to exploit such conditions.

2. Resource utilization: Promoting the availability and utilization of local resources, facilities, and services, and of governmental, economic, and social agencies, for the benefit of the tactical and logistical effort, and denying their use to the enemy.

3. Civil security: Assuring the security of combat troops from civil sources, using public safety agencies to eliminate active and passive sabotage and guerrilla activity, and coordinating civil defense with military area security and damage control operations.

4. International law.—Complying with international law and agreements. This includes provisions for restoring and maintaining public order and safety, for civilian relief supply, and for the care and movement of civilian war and disaster victims, such as casualties, refugees, evacuees, concentration camp internees, displaced persons, and other needy persons.

5. Civil authority.—Reestablishing civil authority; transferring the area from military to civil control; and providing assistance to established civil authority in emergencies and disasters and, where indicated, in the routine conduct of government.

6. Military-civil matters.—Providing a focal point for handling all military-civil matters and, thereby, avoiding a diversion of combat and other military personnel from their primary military tasks by concern with civil as well as with military-civil matters.

CONCLUSION

This presentation is intended only to be suggestive of the vast range of CAMG combat support. A great deal of effort is yet required to define in practical terms all aspects of the CAMG capability to support the combat commander's operations.

There must be a mutual understanding on the part of combat commanders and CAMGO personnel of the responsibilities and capabilities of each in this increasingly vital field.
